Mr. Misdale brought an interesting and successful series of Chamber Concerts to a close in Bradford on the 11th ult. He was assisted in the final Concert by Mr. J H. Beers, a violinist of undoubted accomplishments, and by Mr. Charlesworth Fawcett, a clarinet player of considerable local reputation. The combination served to introduce several fresh works, which secured an attentive hearing. Rubinstein's Sonata for piano and violin did not meet with much acceptance, but Dr. Villiers Stanford's Intermezzi for piano and clarinet, and the Fantasiestücke for the same instruments, by Niels Gade, absorbed the undivided attention of the audience; and the reception of Mozart's E flat Trio for piano, clarinet, and violin (Op. 14), showed a genuine appreciation of music so exquisitely inspired and expressive

The performance of Max Bruch's "Odysseus," or rather of the first two scenes of that work, constituted the leading attraction at an "open meeting" of the Bradford St. Cecilia Society, at the Bradford Technical College, on the 14th ult. The composition proved extremely interesting, and was put before a large audience most intelligently, albeit, for want of an orchestra, somewhat inadequately. The music, melodious to a degree which becomes almost commonplace, falls far short of the heroic nature of the theme which it is intended to illustrate, and if it were not for its beautiful contrasts and almost perfect workmanship, the only effect would be to satiate the ear with agreeable sounds. The passages descriptive of the Tempest come nearer to the quality of genuine inspiration than any other portion of the work heard on this occasion.

excellent phrasing, ability, and the quality of fulness and refinement of tone. The solo vocalists were Miss Hoschke, Mrs. Clayton Russell, and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, the latter gentleman giving an admirable rendering of the part of Odysseus. Mr. Hecht combined the difficult duties of conductor and accompanist to the works of Bruch and Bach. Miss Averdieck and Mr. St. Hensé also assisted as accompanists.

In addition to many admirable glees and part-songs, the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society at its third and final Concert of the season, on the 9th ult., gave a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's Cantata "On Shore and Sea." The chorus singing was effective, and the solo work was in the hands of Miss Wilkinson, a conscientious local artist, and Mr. W. Riley, Miss Iredale, Mr. F. Haigh, Mr. Henry Ackroyde, and Mr. L. E. Stott also contributed songs, Mr. Littlewood giving an instrumental solo for which he was recalled. The Conductor was Mr. W. H. The Society has done much useful work, and Cross. deserves the support of the public, for whose enjoyment it seeks to provide.

The Armley and District Choral Society gave its closing Concert of the season on the 20th ult., the work selected for performance being "Israel in Egypt." It is but four years ago, or thereabouts, that the Society was established, and almost at one bound it has taken a front rank among district choral societies. The energy of its members is great and their musical talent unquestionable, but the ambition of the Society is unbounded, and not content with showing what it can do in a local sense, it has determined to acquire reputation further afield by competition with similar societies in connection with the International Inventions Exhibition. The performance of Handel's great work on the occasion under notice afforded a fair test of the artistic capabilities of the chorus, and the result was gratifying almost beyond expectation. The body of tone was massive to a degree for which one is not always prepared in a chorus of less than a hundred vocalists, and in point of precision and phrasing the performance was almost everything that could be desired. The Society is also happy in the possession of soloists of considerable powers, and to the principals on this occasion-Miss C. I. Swithinbank, Miss Sweeney, and Mr. Waddington-much credit may be conscientiously awarded. The Conductor of the Society is Mr. W. H. Harrison, who is both painstaking and able. The Society had the assistance of a small orchestra, with Mr. Edgar Haddock as leader. Mr. J. Hanson presided at the piano.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.) .

THE ninth and last of this season's Popular Concerts was given on Easter Monday at Colston Hall, Bristol, when for the only time during the season the house was really crowded as it should be at every Concert. If such large audiences were the rule, instead of the exception, doubtless the finances of the Society would be in a less lamentable state than is the case at present. This Concert was an especially interesting one from many points of view, but chiefly from the production of a new organ Concerto from the pen of Mr. Ebenezer Prout, who himself conducted his composition. Mr. Prout is no stranger at these Concerts, having already written three works expressly for Bristol. This new Concerto, No. 2, in E flat, has been composed expressly for Mr. George Riseley. It was written two years ago, and the manuscript had been already sent down to Bristol, when the temporary suspension of the Monday Popular Concerts caused its production to be postponed. In its character the new work differs considerpostponed. In its character the new work differs considerably from its predecessor, No. 1, in E minor. Though modelled upon the same lines it is more concise. The general tone of the Concerto in E minor may be described as elegiac and tender, the one in E flat is more broad and jubilant. The fugal element so closely associated with the organ style comes much more A notice of the performance, however, would be incomplete without a word of genuine appreciation for the admirable work, especially in the finale, and the solo instruction for the solid work, especially in the finale, and the solo instruction in the solid in a somewhat different the rendering of Each's "God's time is the best," showed manner with the orchestra, masses of tone being more frequently employed than solo effects. Throughout the movements, allegro maestoso, larghetto, and finale vivace, the interest is well sustained, and great enthusiasm was evinced by the audience. The passages for the solo instrument are of immense difficulty, but were surmounted with, apparently, the greatest ease by Mr. Riseley, whose magnificent playing seemed to astonish even a Bristol audience, who are necessarily more or less accustomed to it. Both composer and organist were heartily recalled, and it is pleasing to hear that Mr. Prout was thoroughly satisfied with the performance of his work, and spoke in the highest terms of the orchestra. We hope some day to have another opportunity of hearing this grand composition in Bristol. The Unfinished Symphony of Schubert was the chief item in the second part. and was admirably rendered. The Overtures, "Zanetta" (Auber) and "Tannhäuser" (Wagner), the latter splendidly played as usual, with a selection from "Il Trovatore," and a waltz of Gung'l's, completed the orchestral part of the Concert. Miss Phillips and Mr. Montague Worlock were the vocalists, each contributing two songs. In deference to a very strongly expressed wish, on the part of Mr. Riseley, the Society has decided to give a grand extra Concert on the 13th inst., with Mr. Riseley's band and choir of 300 performers, when the works performed will be Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner."

Mr. Riseley gave Organ Recitals at the Colston Hall on Good Friday, both afternoon and evening, and on Easter Eve (when some of Mr. Prout's compositions were performed), and also on the 18th and 25th ult.

The Saturday Musical Association gave its thirty-first Concert, on the 11th ult., at Colston Hall, when Barnett's "Paradise and the Peri," and a missellaneous selection were performed. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Fusselle, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Thomas; Grand Organ, Mr. Riseley; Conductor, Mr. George Gordon.

At Exeter, during the Holy Week, appropriate selections from Gounod's "Redemption" were sung at the evening services at the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, and on Good Friday afternoon Haydn's Passion was given as a special service at the Cathedral. On the same afternoon Mr. Edwin Bending gave an Organ Recital at the Victoria Hall, at which there was but a small attendance, owing partly to the fine weather, and partly to the fact of its being fixed for the same hour as the Cathedral service; and in the evening a Concert of sacred music was held in the same rooms, under the direction of Mr. Farley Sinkins. The Orchestral Society, while still retaining a connection with the Western Counties Musical Association (by which it was originated) has been constituted as an independent Society, and promises its subscribers three Concerts in each The first of these was held on the 9th ult., and was fairly successful. The programme included the Overture to "Rosamunde" (Schubert), "Zampa" (Hérold), and Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, besides sundry smaller items, and three vocal numbers, contributed by Mr. F. Dixon, of the Cathedral Choir. The music was, on the whole, creditably performed; but a little less prominence of the brass, and a little more delicacy in some of the wood wind is to be desired, and will doubtless be obtained by the Conductor, Mr. R. B. Moore, to whose earnestness and care the present efficiency of his band is sufficient testi-

. The eighth annual Festival of the Western Counties Musical Association, to which in honour of the bi-centenary of the great composer a special Handelian character was given, took place on the 16th ult., the programme in the morning comprising Handel's "Alexander's Feast" and the Fourth Organ Concerto, which was played, according to the old custom, after the chorus "Let old Timotheus," and that in the evening Gade's "Psyche" and Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night." All these works were new to Exeter and were well performed, especially considering the scanty opportunities for full rehearsal. An idea of the musical army of the Society, as represented at its latest Festival, may be gathered from the following figures. The chorus (of 290 voices) comprised 110 sopranos, 75 altos, 48 tenors, and 66 basses, from the following places:—Budleigh Salterton (15), Cullompton (40), Exeter (111), Exmouth (19), Silverton (19), North Devon District (13), Taunton and Porlock (15), Teignmouth (19), Tiverton (23), Wellington (17), and Honiton (17). The band (under the able leadership of Mr. M. G. Rice) band (under the able leadership of Mr. M. G. Rice, consisted of sixty-one players: — Eleven first violins, fourteen seconds, seven violas, seven violoncellos, four contra-bassi, one piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, three trumpets, one drum, and organist (Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe), or twenty-six professionals and thirty-five amateurs. chorus singing was, in many instances, particularly good (notably in "The many rend the skies" and "Come with torches"), and showed a marked improvement upon last year. The solo parts were taken by Miss K. Fusselle, Miss Mary Bliss, Miss Butterworth, Mr. Bernard Lane, Mr. Brereton (afternoon), and Mr. Oswald (even-ing), all of whom sang the music allotted to them very efficiently, Mr. Brereton being especially well received in the solos from "Alexander's Feast. Miss Fusselle and Mr. Oswald deserve much credit for their rendering of the difficult parts of Psyche and Eros in Gade's Cantata, the trios in which were charmingly sung by the Misses Bliss and Butterworth and Mr. Bernard Lane, The Organ Concerto was most ably performed by Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe, who was also at the organ throughout the afternoon Concert. The band did its work thoroughly well, and the attendance in the morning was very large, though not so satisfactory in the evening. In conclusion, we offer our sincere congratulations to the talented Conductor, Mr. D. I. Wood, to whose untiring efforts so much success of the Concerts is due.

The Plymouth Vocal Association gave its third and last Subscription Concert for the season in the Guildhall, Plymouth, on the 8th ult. There was a large audience, and a capital programme was presented to commemorate the Handel bi-centenary. The first part consisted chiefly of selections from "Samson," and Gade's "Crusaders," given for the first time in the West of England, formed part two. The full choir of the association did the chorus work, and Miss Clara Samuell, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Hilton were engaged for the solos. The accompaniments were played by a full orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Pardew and Mr. Rice, Mr. A. C. Faull presiding at the grand organ. Mr. F. N. Löhr conducted, and much credit is due to him and his choir for the manner in which the music was performed. We must also add a word of praise to the orchestra for the excellent rendering of the Overture to "Samson" and the accompaniments.

throughout the Concert.

Mr. Augustus Aylward's second Popular Concert of the season was given in the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 8th ult., with the greatest success. The orchestra numbered forty-five performers, and the programme included Mendelssohn's Wedding March, Bennett's Gminor Symphony, the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte," Burnett's Intermezzo, Gounod's Marionette March, &c. Miss Aylward was the solo pianist, and performed Mendelssohn's Caprice Brillant with orchestral accompaniments. Mr. Charles Fletcher played two violin solos both being encored. The vocalist was Miss Emma Fowle. The St. Martin's Choral Society, at the second

The St. Martin's Choral Society, at the second Concert of the season, on the 23rd ult., gave Bennett's "May Queen" with full band and chorus. The principal vocalists were Miss Amy Aylward, A.R.A.M., and Mr. Howgate, of Salisbury Cathedral. The second part was miscellaneous, and the Concert was much enjoyed by the large audience. Mr. Augustus Aylward conducted.

The Sarum Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 14th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed with full band and chorus. Principal vocalists—Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Alice Farren, Mr. C. E. Pillow, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson. There was a large audience, and the whole performance went without the slightest hitch. Mr. Gamble was the leader, and Mr. W. P. Aylward Conductor.

The first performance of Mr. Spinney's interesting work "The Village Belles" was given at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 16th ult., before a crowded audience. The chorus was supplied from Miss Jarman's pupils, Montague House, assisted by friends. The Cantata was heard with every sign of pleasure, and at the conclusion the composer, who presided at the harmonium, was long and loudly applauded. Mrs. Beesley accompanied admirably on the grand pianoforte. The principal singers were Mrs. Wells, Miss Lily Mullings, Mr. Hayden, and Mr.

Percy Smith.

It is an interesting proof of the growth of the love of classical music that at the Easter Concerts of two schools in the West of England-that of the King's School, Sherborne, and of Lord Weymouth's Grammar School, Warminster-a complete Symphony of Beethoven should be performed, the second at Sherborne and the fifth at War-The other parts of the programme were, at the latter school, Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto, and at the former, Part I. of the same composer's "St. Paul." The chorus in each case was composed of pupils of the school as far as the trebles and altos were concerned, and a fair proportion also of the tenors and basses. Many of the solos were taken by the pupils.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In commemoration of the bi-centenary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach, his Passion music ("St. Matthew") was performed at the old church of St. Cuthbert, on the eve of Good Friday, under the direction of Mr. Waddell, by a choir of about one hundred and fifty, accompanied by a string band of about thirty performers, led by Messrs. Daly and Dambmann. The performance was listened to with unflagging interest by a congregation numbering over 2,500. The service was presided over by Dr. Macgregor, the senior pastor, who at once elevated the tone of the congregation by reminding them that they were met together for an act of worship, and not merely for a musical entertainment. The devotional feeling was further sustained by the congregation taking part in a number of the chorals. Some of the difficult portions of the work were omitted, but the continuity of the narrative was tolerably well preserved. A larger combination of the musical resources in Edinburgh would have been necessary in order to do full justice to the memory of so great a master; still, considering the limited means at command, the work was very fairly rendered, and much praise is due to Mr. Waddell for undertaking it at such an appropriate season, and in a place so suitable. The soloists were Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Anderson, Miss Noble, Mr. Millar Craig, and Mr. Gledhill, all of whom acquitted themselves satisfactorily. It was gratifying to see so many of the congregation arrive, score in hand, ready to enjoy this, in Scotland, unique performance.

On the 7th ult., the Philharmonic Society gave its fifth Concert, at the Morningside Athenæum. A chorus and orchestra, numbering 100, performed Macfarren's Cantata "May Day," which proved most enjoyable to the audience, under the skilful conductorship of Mr. Carl Hamilton and Mr. Francis Gibson. Mr. Hamilton gave great delight by his rendering of Mendelssohn's Variations for cello in D flat, accompanied by Mr. F. Gibson.

The St. Bernard's Choral Society gave its first Concert on the 9th ult., when a selection from Gaul's "Holy City" and Anderton's Cantata "The wreck of the Hesperus" were performed. Mr. C. S. Hamilton conducted.

A morning Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, on the 11th ult., for the benefit of the Longmore Hospital, by Mr. Kirkhope's private choir, accompanied by a small string band, piano and harmonium. The principal items in the programme were Gounod's Motett "Gallia," Villiers in the programme were Gounou's Motett Samm, Stanford's "Elegiac Ode," and Gade's "Spring Fantasie" for four sole voices nianoforte and orchestra. The piano part was ably sustained by Mr. Francis Gibson. programme also comprised glees and part-songs, among them Sir R. P. Stewart's clever setting of "Cruiskeen Lawn" and Otto Schweizer's 2 capella arrangement of "When the kye come hame." The choir throughout did full justice to the music, but the orchestra was too limited for the proper rendering of the orchestral effects. Among the soloists we must particularly commend the fine execu-tion of Mrs. Ellis in Gounod's "Gallia." Thanks are due to Mr. Kirkhope, the Conductor of this Society, for his energy and skill in bringing before the public novelties of so high a character in so praiseworthy a

Last, but not least, is to be mentioned a very creditable performance in St. Mary's Cathedral, in conjunction with the other local episcopal choirs, of the first part of Gounod's "Redemption," under the baton of Mr. Collinson, Organist of St. Mary's, on Good Friday. The Cathedral was filled by a very appreciative congregation, and Mr. Collinson, whose fortnightly organ recitals at the same Church I must not forget to mention, is to be highly congratulated on his success, both as Conductor and Organist.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW,

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE fifth annual Concert of the University (male voice) Choral Society took place on the 2nd ult., in the Bute Hall so named in honour of the Marquis of Bute, a most munificent donor of the College. There was a large audience. A chorus from Mendelssohn's "Œdipus," Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn," and Mendelssohn's "Ode to the Sons of Art," with some lighter music by the choir, together with songs and instrumental selections, constituted the entertainment, which, if hardly up to the standard that should be aimed at, was yet sufficiently pleasing. Several other Concerts took place on the evening of the 2nd ult., namely, the Glasgow Unitarian Musical Association, with a performance of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," orchestrally accompanied, Mr. D. R. Munro conducting; the choir of St. Ninian's Established Church (Mr. J. H. S. Duncan, Conductor), with a programme of short pieces, sacred and secular; and the South Side Choral Society, under Mr. McKean, with selections from "Elijah" and "Samson."

In the Wellington Palace, on the 7th ult., a Concert was given by the Glasgow Musical Union, consisting chiefly of glees and part-songs. A short Cantata, "The call to battle," the words by Mrs. Hemans and the music by William Hume, was included. Mr. W. Moodie conducted and Mr. C. H. Miller accompanied on the piano. The Choir and Musical Association of John Street United Presbyterian Church submitted their annual programme on the same evening, the selections including Mendels-sohn's "Hear my prayer" and "Spring," from Haydn's "Seasons." Mr. George Taggart conducted and Messrs. Luther Hall and J. Logie accompanied on piano and harmonium. The Hillhead Musical Society, at one time the leading association of its kind in Glasgow, but which has, for some reason not easy to explain, but certainly not from the want of good training, fallen away both in numbers and musical ability, gave the second Concert of the season in the Queen's Rooms, on the 7th ult., in presence of the usual crowded audience of friends. Gounod's "Third Solemn Mass" occupied the first part of the programme, the accompaniments being played by a small orchestra. Mr. W. T. Hoeck conducted. Hofmann's "Melusina" was performed at the annual Concert of the Philomel Society on the 6th ult., Mr. Julius Seligmann conducting. A second performance of Mackenzie's new Oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," was given on the evening of the 9th ult., by the Tonic Sol-fa Choral Society, in St. Andrew's Hall. A. R. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth," which has been in noticeable favour here this season, was very successfully rendered by the Choir of St. Vincent Street United Presbyterian Church on the 10th ult., under the direction of Mr. Hugh McNabb. Miss K. Johnstone, from the Royal Academy, took part in the solos. Messrs. L. and T. Hall accompanied on the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

An interesting triad of musical works by Gade, Goetz, and Mackenzie was produced at the Concert of the Pollokshields Association on the 13th ult., one of these, Goetz's "Nonia." being performed for the first time in Scotland. The Concert opened with a bright rendering of Gade's "Spring's Message." Following the not very satisfactory singing (unaccompanied) of Henry Leslie's "Lullaby of life" came "Nœnia," the rendering of which remarkably clever, scholarly and deeply expressive composition, was very fairly successful, considering the undoubted difficulties of the choral writing. Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride" concluded the Concert. Its many beauties were well brought out under Mr. Hoeck's sympathetic conducting. Kyrle Choir, in furtherance of the praiseworthy aims of the Society, of which it forms a part, has given several Concerts, at nominal charges for admission, in the poorer parts of the town. A Concert was given by the Choir in the Queen's Rooms on the 14th ult., for the purpose of raising funds for its gratuitous operations, and there was a gratifying response on the part of the public. The programme comprised Gade's "Spring's Message," Grimm's "The Soul's Aspiration," Adolf Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," and C. H. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander." There was a good orchestra under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, and none of the music therefore suffered from lack of proper accompaniment. The choir numbered 100 voices, the soprano and alto parts being of particularly fine quality. Jensen's "Feast of Adonis" was well presented, and the larger work which followed (" Hero and Leander,") was done every justice to. The adoption of the Greek tonalities for Nos. 2 and 4 seemed to be highly appreciated, all the more, perhaps, that the cadences bear a noticeable likeness to those of Celtic music, with which people are so familiar here. Mr. Allan Macbeth conducted. Two solos were played on the viol di gamba, by Mr. Walton, a member of Mr. Cole's orchestra. On the same evening the Partick Musical Association gave its annual Concert in the Burgh Hall, with Jackson's Cantata "The Year," as the principal feature of the programme. Misses Johnstone and Sneddon from the Royal Academy, and Messrs. Dunsmore and Fleming were the principals. Mrs. Bannerman was an efficient pianoforte accompanist. Mr. H. McNabb conducted.

In Scotland, boys' voices are as yet but little utilised in Church choirs or musical societies, but there is a decided movement in that direction, and the institution of such societies as the Glasgow Academy Choir, so long conducted by Mr. J. Maclaren, and the Southern Boys' Choir, now in its second year and under the charge of Mr. H. McNabb, where the treble and alto parts are exclusively sung by boys, cannot fail to demonstrate the resources that lie to our hands in recruiting for musical service. A Concert by the latter-named society, the second that has now been given, took place in Govanhill Burgh Hall on the 16th ult., attracting a large audience. A select number of tenor and bass voices took part, singing also one or two pieces alone as a variety. The general choir was particularly successful in two anthems by Dr. Stainer, "O Zion that bringest," and "What are these?" In a number of secular selections which were sung in the second half of the programme, the most agreeable were the glees by Stevens, Callcott, and others, in which the alto part was taken by all the boys. A solo and chorus, "Sailor, my Sailor," by W. Hume, which has become rather popular with treble and alto choirs, was very effectively rendered, and encored. Miss Corbet accompanied on the piano, and

Mr. W. Schofield on the harmonium.

The Dennistoun Musical Society, conducted by Mr. T. S. Drummond, performed C. H. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander," at its annual Concert on the 15th ult. Mr. John Brown accompanied.

The choir of Camphill United Presbyterian Church, conducted by Mr. W. Schofield, gave a Concert on the 21st ult., Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" being included in the programme. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was the principal feature in a Concert given by the Institute Choir of the Foundry Boys' Religious Society, on the 24th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. A. Myles.

The amount over from the Choral and Orchestral Season of 1884-85 is £513 4s. $8\frac{1}{2}$ d., which, with the former balance, has left a total surplus on hand of £2.695 13s. A dividend of 5s. in the pound is to be paid to the guarantors who kindly met the demands upon them in former unprofitable years. This makes a repayment to these gentlemen of 15s. in the pound of the £4.252 they had to make good.

15s. in the pound of the £4,252 they had to make good. Costa's "Eli" and Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" are two of the choral works decided on by the Glasgow Choral

Union for next season's Concerts

The annual Concert of the Uddingston Musical Association took place on the 21st ult, Mr. James Allan conducting. Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" was performed, together with glees, part-songs, and solos. The choral singing was excellent.

MUSIC IN OUR VILLAGES. THE EATON FESTIVAL.

IT is with great interest that we have watched the spread and success of Mr. Henry Leslie's village choir movement, which he started some five years ago in Montgomeryshire, and which is creeping slowly and surely over England, going to the very root of national musical cultivation by the thorough instruction, among its other branches, of our village children. It would be hardly possible to witness a more creditable result of a few years' training of village material than that which took place under the Duke of Westminster's auspices, at Eaton, on the 11th ult. choirs were drawn from the five neighbouring villages on the Duke's estates, Aldford, Eaton, Eccleston, Handbridge and Pulford. Every pupil is taught to read music either by the old notation or the tonic sol-fa system, and singing by ear is entirely discouraged. Each place possesses its own teacher or sub-choirmaster, and the whole association is superintended by Mr. H. J. Timothy, the Eaton organist, to whom much praise is due for the admirable energy and ability he has devoted to the movement.

The choirs, divided into senior and junior, compete for diplomas and banners of honour, and there is also a diploma of honour for quartet singing. Mr. Leslie, who adjudicated, in the course of a few remarks before communicating his decisions, laid special stress on the importance of the training of the junior choirs; and we cannot but feel that in the instruction given in sight reading to the village children lies the strength and possibilities of future greatness for the movement.

The competition commenced at half-past ten, and lasted (including a short interval and an afternoon Concert, in which the winning choirs took part) until after six o'clock. If we consider the long English winter, with its interminable evenings beginning at four o'clock, the benefit, socially, of such a means of employment as this teaching will in time insure to our village folk, cannot be too highly estimated. Indoor occupation is always a difficulty in cottages, and any form of employment after working hours, which can be, at the same time, made a harmless pleasure, lessens the power of our national vice, Drink, and softens those who come under its influence.

We cannot too earnestly hope that those who are "in authority" in our counties and villages may be encouraged by this short account of the success of the Eaton Festival, to follow the example of the Duke of Westminster, and give their personal aid to a movement which is so eminently calculated to produce the best results, both socially and musically, among the cottagers of England. The afternoon performance consisted of a Concert in which the Hon. Mrs. R. Lyttelton, Miss Wakefield and Miss Augusta Hervey took part. Messrs. Ratliff, Benson, Hardy and Hon. S. G. Lyttelton also sang some partsongs, which, in their execution were an admirable lesson to the choirs. There was, in addition to this, a string quartet led by M. Louis D'Egville, who also contributed some solos. We cannot conclude without offering cordial congratulations to Mr. Leslie on the growing success of his excellent movement and wish him more support, similar to that extended by the Duke of Westminster, to insure its promotion throughout the United Kingdom.

MUSIC IN AMERICA. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, April 12, 1885.

The most significant features in the musical activity of the metropolis during the last month or two have been the projects looking toward a more thorough and energetic cultivation of local talent that have been put before the public. Mr. van der Stucken, of whose Novelty Concerts I cultivation of local talent that have been put before the public. Mr. van der Stucken, of whose Novelty Concerts I have spoken heretofore, made a bold stroke at his last Concert given in Steinway Hall, on March 31, by admitting none but American compositions to the programme. The experiment was viewed with considerable curiosity since only the higher order of compositions have figured in Mr. van der Stucken's schemes, and in this department of original creation little if any encouragement has been given to American musicians. The number of times within ten years that a symphony by an American, or even an overture, has formed part of a first-class Concert in this city or in Boston, can almost be counted on one's Conductors and managers of Concerts have held aloof from them as if their production, even as single numbers in extended schemes, would bring financial disaster. Many times the eyes of ambitious musicians have been turned to Mr. Theodore Thomas in the hope that he, like a Moses, would lead them out of the Egypt of neglect; but they have looked in vain. Our Philharmonic Society, which stands for the highest in musical art in this country, has been equally indifferent, although nothing is clearer than that a systematic and vigorous encouragement of native composition by this organisation, not only would give a great impetus to musical production, but would do so without loss of prestige or money to the Society. But the refusal of the Philharmonic to perform American works is only another indication of that conservatism or timidity of which I took occasion to speak in this place last December.

Mr. van der Stucken is a young man who has faith in the Americans as a people, and who has acquired the conviction by association with some of the leaders of the national schools of music in Europe (Benoit, Grieg, and Liszt) that Americans will produce good music in the course of time if the conditions can but be established here, which made such men as I have mentioned representatives of special tendencies in Europe. He seems to believe that if the compositions of American musicians are performed, and the needed incentive to creation supplied, a man will arise who will possess the qualities of genius essential to leadership, and that such a man will become an influence, and younger men, clustering around him, we will soon have an American school of composition.

I do not know whether Mr. van der Stucken's convictions on this point go so far as to lead him to believe that such a school will possess a distinction, or characteristic flavour. The plain teachings of such national schools as the Norse and others that have been strongly influential in Europe, would seem to be that a consummation like this must wait upon the development of more markedly national traits than the American people possess. At present, as Mr. Joseph Bennett pointed out with clearness and ability, in his preliminary observations on American music in the March number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, we are far from being a nation in art matters. The world has poured all its varied elements into one mould, and we must wait patiently for them to unite in a product which will be recognisable as something new and native to the soil. We have no Volkslied, and there are not wanting those who predict that we never will have one. It cannot be uninteresting in connection with this discussion to read what one of the foremost American musicians has to say on this subject. I violate no confidence in printing the following passage from a private letter addressed to me after Mr. van der Stucken's Concert by Mr. Dudley Buck, one of whose compositions figured among the American novelties produced on that occasion: "That America is sure to produce, in time, some great original musical writer, is fair to assume. That writer will be original in my view, however, not through anything distinctively American, but by his own individuality per se. Look at Italy; her 'school,' technically speaking, is dying. Boïto, Sgambati, and others do not represent the Italian idea any more than Saint-Saëns and (especially) Gouvy represent the French, or Cowen and Mackenzie the English idea. The great classics (the Scwerpunkt of music, so to speak, existing in Germany) are bound to affect all the world, and the men mentioned are the proof thereof. A possible, or apparent, exception is Dvorák, whose acquaintance I chance personally to possess. He proves my theory as a Bohemian of the Bohemians—a sort of apotheosis, artistically speaking, of gipsy music. Now, then, with all the world pouring its art results into America, and, more too, its actual nationalities, we are going to obtain in time an amalgam of a very strong, not to say the strongest, type. have strong originalities despite the lack of home protection, which Europe has always had; but an American 'school' I doubt if we ever will have in view of the fact that the ends of the earth are growing cosmopolitan.

Mr. Buck's line of reasoning is fanciful, and I let it stand this somewhat extended prelude that he concedes the likelihood that a strongly original composer will arise in America. When this happens, and the eyes of the world are directed towards him, the rest will soon follow. His original traits will be the leaven for the lump of American music that will speedily be mixed. The American Concert to which I have referred proved that we already come near to having such a man in Professor John Knowles Paine, of Harvard University, whose prelude to the "Œdipus Tyrannus" led off on that occasion. This piece of music, which ought to be known in England, would be worthy of the best German writer living; I heard it when it was first performed at Cambridge in connection with Sophocles' tragedy, and have heard it repeatedly since, each time with a growing sense of its beauty, dignity, and nobility. Better incidental music than it, and its companion pieces, has not been composed for any of the classic plays. In it, and Mr. Buck's overture to Scott's "Marmion," there was ample evidence of native strength to justify hopes for the speedy achievement of the purposes which are at the base of Mr. Van der Stucken's agitation. All the other compositions, in particular those of two young New Yorkers now resident in Germany, George Templeton Strong and E. A. MacDowell, reflected the influence of the works of Liszt and Wagner in a degree which made one look only to the technical execution for signs of creative talent. The programme was as follows :-

Prelude to Sophocles' " Œdipus Tyrannus," Op. 35 (J. K. Paine).
Concerto for Pianoforte, A minor, Op. 15, second and third movements
(E. A. MacDowell). Miss Adele Margulies.
Overture to "Marmion" (Dudley Buck).
Scene and Air, "Once as I told in glee," from "The Tale of the Viking' (G. E. Whiting). Miss Marie Van.
Interlude from "Viasda" and "Singers' Festival Procession" (E. van der Stucken).

American Legend, for violin and orchestra, Op. 101 (E. C. Phelps).
Ovide Musin.

Symphonic Poem, "Undine," Op. 14 (G. Templeton Strong).

The verdict of critics and public on this Concert (in which Miss Marie Van, a young American singer just returned from Europe, made her entrance on the Metropolitan Concert stage-a young woman with a lovely soprano voice and good style) was that it was in no particular inferior in merit to any one of the series of Novelty Concerts given by Mr. van der Stucken. This young and energetic Conductor's project, though it failed of financial success, was artistically productive of excellent results, and will be carried out again next season. The Concerts were four in number, and presented the following list of novelties, namely :-

Benoit, Pierre (Flemish). Interlude from "Charlotte Corday." Brahms, Johannes (German). Symphony in F, No. 3.
Buck, Dudley (American). Overture to Scott's "Marmion."
Chabrier, Emanuel (French). Rapsodie Espana.
Dvorák, Antonin (Bohemian). Overture, "Husitzka."
Floersheim, Otto (German-American). "Alla Marcia."
Godard, Benjamin (French). Symphonie Gothique, No. 3.
Goldschmidt, Adalbert von (German). Love scene from "Die Sieben Todsinden." Todsünden,

Heimendahl, Edward (German-American). Intermezzo. Holländer, Gustav (German). Romance for violin and orchestra,

In addition to this movement in favour of American compositions I have to record the launching of an enter-prise analagous to that which Mr. Carl Rosa has carried to success in England. A wealthy patroness of music, who is putting her money and influence in the scale in support of Mr. Thomas's projected Popular Concerts, is ambitious also to establish what she is pleased to call "American opera." This American opera is merely opera in English here without assailing it. It is enough for the purposes of with whatever national prestige can be acquired from the engagement of American artists. It is the lady's purpose to make the experiment with a season of operatic performances at the Academy of Music early in 1886, that is, so soon as the house is vacated by Mr. Mapleson or whoever is the venturesome entrepreneur that will give us Italian opera next season. She has placed the matter in the hands of Mr. Charles E. Locke, business manager for Mr. Thomas, as director of the enterprise, and is working on the sympathy and nominal support derived from Mr. Thomas, who is mentioned as artistic director of the scheme, though it is obvious that his own plans will keep him fully occupied to the exclusion of all work in behalf of "American opera." That there is a grain of merit in the project no American would be so unpatriotic as to deny; but the lady's announcements have been so extravagant and reckless of the most obvious teachings of facts that they have been received by the newspaper press of New York with incredulous smiles or open derision. Much more good in the line of national musical advance-ment is to be expected from the ninth annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association to be held at the Academy of Music on the first three days of July. This association has undertaken the formidable task of raising the standard of musical instruction throughout the country, and its session will be devoted to a discussion of points in musical pedagogy. The programme is not yet announced, but considerable time will be devoted to the question of musical instruction in the public schools (on which point George F. Bristow and Theodore F. Seward, of this city, and N. Coe Stewart, of Cleveland, Ohio, will be heard). Mr. William Mason will treat of "Accentuation in Pianoforte Playing," Frederick W. Root, of Chicago, of "Vocal Culture," and, on the invitation of the Executive Committee, Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, musical critic of The New York Tribune, will read a paper on "Musician, Critic, and Public." It is thought that the Convention will be attended by over 500 music teachers.

At the Concert of the Philharmonic Society last night, and the public rehearsal on the preceding afternoon, Mr. Cowen's "Welsh" symphony had its first performance in America. The magnificent band of the Society under the direction of Mr. Thomas, gave a marvellously lucid and sympathetic reading of the work, and each of its movements evoked applause. Mr. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" is the next novelty which we are to hear. The mention of Mr. Mackenzie recalls the fact that a former pupil of his, Madame Helen Hopekirk, concluded a series of pianoforte recitals at Steinway Hall last Tuesday evening. She has made a good impression on the lovers of pianoforte music by her exhibition of sterling qualities as an intellectual executant and her recitals have been the most delightful of the season. On May 1, she will go to Boston, and until next winter will travel through the country

It is significant of the tendency of the times with respect to Italian Opera that Mr. Mapleson's Spring season at the Academy of Music, which will begin on April 20, is limited to six performances, all crowded into a single week. Mr. Mapleson, with Patti and Nevada, is now in Chicago, achieving a vast popular success with what is breezily termed an "operatic festival"—ordinary operatic representations given in an Exposition building, which is so large that one can scarcely see across it. But this suits the buoyant Western idea, and as for the doughty Colonel, "it likes him well." The German company is in Boston and doing a good business. Its success in Chicago was followed by a disastrous season in Cincinnati.

GOUNOD'S "REDEMPTION" AT ROME.

In recording the first performance, in the opening week of last month, of M. Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption" at Rome, we are fully aware that we are stating a remarkable fact. Oratorio is not an art-form adapted to the taste of the average Italian amateur. In another part of our present number, indeed, we are reminded of the fact that the first introduction of an oratorio by Handel to an Italian audience has been a matter of quite recent occurrence (at

It is the lady's of the occurrence, or honestly state their want of appreciation of the present phase of the artistic development of "the composer of 'Faust' and 'Romeo e Giulietta." To quote only one disparaging remark out of many, La Capitale says, inter alia: "It rarely falls to one's lot to have to assist at so splendid a performance of so miserable a production." However, the fact of the execution having been a fine one is admitted on all sides, and this leaves room for the hope that Gounod's sacred chef-d'œuvre will be some day appreciated in Italy, as it already is elsewhere; though it may require the continued efforts of such sterling musicians as Signor Roberti, at Turin, and Signor Sgambati, at Rome (who conducted the present performance), before this end will be finally attained. The King and Queen of Italy, as well as many high dignitaries of State, were present at the performance, which took place at the Costanzi Theatre, the house being crowded.

OBITUARY.

FRANZ ABT .- This well-known German composer died at Wiesbaden, on the 2nd ult. He was born at Eilenburg. in Prussian Saxony, December 22, 1819; his father being a clergyman resident there. Abt's education, at Bach's old school in Leipzig, and in the University of that city, would have fitted him, according to parental intention, for the same sacred profession; but Abt felt no "call" to the pulpit. Consequently, on the death of his father, he dismissed the Church, and took up with music-his real vocation, as he honestly thought, and his friends clearly saw. It does not appear that Abt received a formal and systematic training in the art. Probably he had learned a good deal while supposed to be studying theology. Anyhow, we next hear of him (1841), at Zurich, conducting choral societies, and largely composing for men's Nine years later he became attached to the Hof-Theater at Brunswick, and three years after that rose to be principal capellmeister in the same establishment, a post he retained till death. As a composer, Abt certainly was not great, the only thing great about him being his popularity, which arose out of the facility and success with which he produced pieces adapted to the taste of a vast majority of his countrymen. His songs and part-songs are very numerous, and many of them long ago found favour in this country, the best-known example being "When the swallows homeward fly." Abt was essentially a man who laboured for the people at a standpoint very little above their own level. Hence he was understood and appreciated without difficulty, and certainly with much profit to himself. He wrote for the pianoforte and other instruments at one period of his career, but for a very long time past devoted himself entirely to the line in which his strength lay. He will long be remembered throughout his native land.

THE programme of the Hereford Musical Festival. which commences on September 8, is now arranged subject to revision. Monday the 7th will be devoted to rehearsals. to revision. Monday the 7th will be devoted to rehearsals. The Cathedral performances will be, on Tuesday, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; Wednesday morning, Gounod's "Redemption," and in the evening, Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Bach's "A Stronghold Sure"; Thursday, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" (conducted by the composer), and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"; and on Friday, Handel's "Messiah." Miscellaneous Concerts will be given in the Shie Hall on Tuesday and Thursday agenting of in the Shire Hall on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, at the first of which will be performed a new Cantata, entitled "St. Kevin," by Dr. Joseph Smith (Dublin); and at the second a new work, especially written for the Festival by Dr. C. H. Lloyd, entitled "The Song of Baldur," words by Weatherly. There will also be a Chamber Concert in the Shire Hall on Friday evening. The artists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Coward, Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton. The chorus will be supplied from Gloucester, Worcester, Hereford, Bradford, &c., and a temporary organ will be erected by Messrs. Willis. gratifying to state that the largest number of Stewards ever Turin). It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if the obtained for a Hereford Festival has been secured—viz., numerous press organs of the capital, in reporting on the event, either confine themselves to a mere announcement Cathedral, will be the Conductor.

An Orchestral Concert by the students of the Royal Academy of Music was given at St. James's Hall on the 14th ult., before a large audience. Specimens of the compositions of the pupils were presented in a vocal Fantasia, by F. Kilvington Hattersley—an exceedingly clever work, admirably sung by Miss Eleanor Rees—a Concert Overture, "Heroic," by Rowland Briant, written with praiseworthy clearness, and effectively scored, and an exceedingly graceful Serenade, by Arthur E. Godfrey, to which Miss McKrill did ample justice. The good teaching in the pianoforte department was shown by Miss Dora Bright, in the Adagio and Allegretto Agitato, from Moscheles' Concerto in G minor, and by Miss Webb, in the Allegro from Raff's Concerto in C minor; a violoncello solo by Piatti being also well played by Mr. J. C. Hambleton, and Maurer's Concertante in A, for four violins, being so excellently rendered by Miss Winifred Robinson, Miss Cecilia Gates, Miss Chetham, and Miss Cocks (pupils of M. Sainton), as to elicit the most enthusiastic applause. Vocal solos were successfully contributed by Miss Annie Dwelley, Messrs. Vaughan Edwardes, and Orlando Harley; Mozart's fine Litaniæ in B flat (principal singers, Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Ada Rose, Mr. W. Nicholl, and Mr. Theo. Moss) most effectively displaying the careful training of the choir under Mr. William Shakespeare, who conducted the Concert with his usual ability.

A SERIES of Services of Praise have been held in the Church of St. Peter's, Ellastone, Staffordshire, during the past twelve months, with the intention of testing, as far as possible, the popular feeling in country parishes with regard to music of a high class when well rendered. It has been maintained that the poorer classes do not care to sit for one or two hours to listen to oratorio or cantata, partly because the music is beyond them, and partly because a long story, however dramatically described, requires from them too sustained an effort of attention. It was thought, however, that the Christmas and Easter stories, so well known to the poorest, and so often and so powerfully treated by the best composers, might attract where other things have failed. Three services have therefore been drawn up, the first given at Easter, 1884, lasting one hour; the second at Christmas, one hour and a-half; the third given on Easter Tuesday last, a little over two hours. On each occasion the church was well filled, and almost entirely with working people, the services being followed with wrapt attention. The last service was exceedingly well rendered by the local glee class, numbering thirty-five voices, assisted by a number of well-known amateurs. Mr. John C. Ward, Organist of Leslie's Choir, presided at the organ.

We have much pleasure in drawing attention to the claims of the Chamber Music Society, at Newcastleupon-Tyne, which commences its sixth season in November next. Founded by a number of gentlemen interested in the subject of Chamber Music five years ago, the list of subscribers has gradually increased, and concerts of the highest class have been given. The income from the subscriptions has been supplemented by the sale of single tickets to the members at a fractional advance on the cost of the subscribers' tickets, and to the public at a premium. A calculation of the number of single tickets sold in each season shows that the members have acted on the advice that it is more blessed to give than to receive, and have freely exercised their privilege of supplying their friends with tickets at reduced rates. It is now earnestly hoped that these friends may be induced to become members, so that they may acquire that patronage which in the past they have received; for the continued existence of so excellent a Society is of the utmost importance to the musical public of Newcastle.

MISS KATE WESTROP, Organist of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, gave an excellent Organ Recital at the church in Lombard Street, on Wednesday, the 8th ult. The programme included works by Handel, Batiste, Hesse, Tours, Stephens, &c. Four short voluntaries composed by Miss Westrop, and played for the first time, were much appreciated. The church was crowded, and the singing of the choir in anthems by Dr. Stainer, Dr. Bunnett, &c., was very creditable.

This year being the Bi-centenary of Handel, the festival at the Crystal Palace that would fall due in 1886, is to be held in 1885, and there is every promise that, musically at least, it will surpass all its predecessors. The most eminent solo singers have been engaged; and the quality and organisation of the stupendous band and chorus—of 4,000 performers—is receiving very anxious attention. Never before has the work of testing each voice that is admitted to take part in the performance, and the elimination of weak and decayed voices, been so closely practised. At the last Festival, it will be remembered, the fatal illness of Sir Michael Costa to the last moment made it doubtful who was to take his place, and Mr. Manns had to accept the bâton on the very morning of the Rehearsal day, with a success which has ensured his continuance of this important post. There are to be double the number of rehearsals of the metropolitan voices—the great body styled the "London Contingent"—and energetic efforts are being made to promote the necessary cohesion of the parts of the great choir, hitherto more or less separated until they met on Rehearsal day in the Great Orchestra. The contingents of voices from the provinces will include, as on all former occasions, the Cathedral Choirs and the great county societies. The constitution of the whole chorus, in regard to its musical quality, is now nearly completed, and the great rehearsals will soon begin. The Londoners are to meet in Exeter Hall as heretofore. The local centres have yet to be fixed. Already the regular habitués of the Handel Festivals, who attend every day, have commenced securing the best seats, that are always first allotted to them, and their numbers furnish every indication that interest in the great celebration is unabated-indeed, it is as keen this year as the best wisher can desire, on account of this being a special celebration. Applications come from the most distant places, from America, from Italy, Sweden, all parts of Germany, and-whatever may be the present turmoil of affairs political-from Russia.

PERFORMANCES of Bach's (St. John) Passion music were given with full orchestral accompaniment in the recently enlarged and beautified Church of St. Marylebone on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday nights in Passion week, when the church was crowded. The orchestra, principally made up of members of the Richter band, was led by Herr Emil Mahr, and conducted by Mr. Oliver King (Pianist to the Princess Louise). The choruses were most effectively rendered, Mr. King having evidently spared no pains in rehearsals. The solo parts were taken by Mr. Alfred Kenningham and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes. Mr. Kenningham's part was carefully and conscientiously sung, and Mr. Edwardes gave the solos "Consider O my soul," and "It is finished," with all the earnestness and pathos they required. Mr. Oliver King bids fair to become an excellent Conductor, his beat being particularly well defined, and his tempi always showing much judgment. Mr. W. B. Kendal and Mr. Henry Yates rendered valuable assistance in the bass and tenor recitatives.

The fourth season of the Civil Service Vocal Union was brought to a very satisfactory conclusion with the annual Ladies' Concert, which was given at Princes Hall, Piccadilly, on the 16th ult. The programme included Hatton's "Summer Eve," Prendergast's "The Wines," Alice Mary Smith's "Song of the Little Baltung," and a bold chorus "Thor's War Song," deservedly encored, from the pen of the hon. Conductor, Mr. J. H. Maunder. Mr. C. Spencer West contributed an ably-executed flute solo, "La Sirène" (Terschak), and vocal soli were given by Messrs. Henry Yates, Charles Chilley, Sydney Beckley, E. G. Richardson, and B. Pierpoint, the gentleman last named singing with decided success. Mr. J. H. Maunder discharged his duties with ability, and Messrs. I. J. Sealy and J. P. Harding accompanied.

A Selection of Sacred Music was given by Mr. J. G. Boardman, the Organist at St. Mark's, Kennington, on Good Friday afternoon. The programme included excerpts from the works of Handel, Mozart and Spohr, with the addition of the "Seven words of our Saviour" (Gounod), and the Funeral March of Beethoven. The attendance numbered over 1,000. These performances are annually looked forward to by the members of the congregation, and should unquestionably be warmly encouraged.

A Special Service of a highly festal character was held at St. Michael's, Bowes Park, on Tuesday, the 21st ult., the occasion being the eleventh anniversary of the consecration of this church. The choir, largely augmented from several London churches, sang with great spirit and precision; the music including Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F (Berthold Tours); Handel's Twelfth Chandos Anthem, "O praise the Lord, ye angels" (with additional accompaniments by E. Silas); and the Hallelujah Chorus. The orchestral accompaniments were effectively supplied by a band of thirty performers, led by Mr. H. C. Tonking, R.A. M. After the Benediction the congregation remained to hear Handel's first Organ Concerto in G minor, which was finely rendered by Dr. Charles W. Pearce. The organ was also judiciously used by Dr. Pearce throughout the service. The alto solos in the anthem were sung by Mr. H. Ball of Lincoln's Inn Chapel, and the bass solos by Mr. J. Blackney, of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. Mr. Henry J. Baker conducted.

THE usual Concert was given on Good Friday, at the West Kensington Park Wesleyan Church. Valuable assistance was rendered by Miss Ada Thacker, Miss De Levante, and Mr. James Sauvage. Miss Thacker obtained a recall for the aria "For my soul thirsteth" and the recitative and air "My tears have been my meat" (Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm); Miss De Levante sang "What hope remains" and the air "Though all thy friends" (Spohr's "Calvary"), receiving an encore; Mr. Sauvage gave with much success Gounod's "There is a green hill and the recitative "Though stricken" and air "It is enough" ("Elijah"), for which he was recalled; the aria "Hear ye, Israel," was sung by Mrs. West, and other solos by Miss Oliver, Messrs. Wood and Fruin. The choruses were well rendered. Miss Crisp presided at the organ, Miss Annie Crisp (of the Guildhall School of Music) accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Barratt West conducted. There was a very large audience.

On the 17th ult. the final Concert of the season in connection with the Clapton Park Choral Society was given in the Lecture Hall adjoining Clapton Park Chapel, when, by special desire, Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner" was performed. The vocalists were Miss Clara Field, Miss Rose Dafforne, and Messrs. J. Child, C. W. Link, and T. Pugh. Miss Dafforne was very successful, her rendering of the air "O sleep! it is a gentle thing" being loudly encored, and duly responded to. The duet, "But tell me, tell me," by the same vocalist and Miss Clara Field, was also given with sweetness and expression, and heartily re-demanded. The choir was large and well trained, and sang the choruses with spirit, reflecting creditably on the able Conductor, Mr Robert Hainworth. Mr. David Davies presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Fountain Meen at the harmonium. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music.

On the 1st ult., and also on the previous Wednesday in Lent, the greater portion of Baoh's "St. Matthew" Passion Music was sung as the anthem at the evening services held in St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square. In the solos Mr. Harper Kearton gave an admirable reading of the music allotted to the principal tenor, and Mr. Frank Pownall rendered very commendable service as bass. The leading soprano and alto parts were well sung by Masters Wood, Fidge, and Richardson. The choruses, which were given without the assistance of the bâton, were interpreted with marked precision and force by a well-trained body of voices; the regular choir of the church being considerably augmented for the occasion. Mr. W. de M. Sergison presided at the organ.

BARNETT'S "Ancient Mariner" was performed by the Erith Choral Society on the 21st ult., under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire. The soloists were Madame Willis, Miss Merydith Elliott, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. The performance was an excellent one in every respect, Mr. Tufnail being particularly successful in the baritone part. Miss Elliott has a contratto voice of good compass, and her singing was much appreciated. The execution of the choruses gave ample proof of careful preparation. Mr. Sidney Naylor, as usual, accompanied.

On Tuesday evening, March 31, Miss Florence Fox gave an interesting Concert at the Lancaster Hall, Noting Hill. The vocalists were Mesdames Frances Willis and Florence Fox, Messrs. Arthur Weston and Frank Quatremayne. The tenor voice of Mr. Arthur Weston was heard to great advantage in the solo "In native worth," from Haydn's "Creation," and the sympathetic manner in which he rendered "Stars of the summer night (Tours) gained him a hearty encore. The singing of Madame Willis was distinguished by brilliancy and refinement, and Mr. Frank Quatremayne was also highly successful. The other vocalist, Miss Florence Fox (a pupil of Mr. Quatremayne), is new to us, but she is the possessor of a pleasing voice, and was warmly applauded and recalled after her songs. The rest of the programme was highly interesting and well rendered. The accompanists were Mr. Arthur Godfrey and Miss Amy Balcombe.

The members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 195th monthly Concert to a large audience in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, on the roth ult. The solo artists were Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Ethel Murray, Miss Blanche Murray, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. R. F. Roberts, and Mr. Chaplin Henry, who were highly successful. The part-singing, which included "God bless the Prince of Wales" (B. Richards), "A Spring Song" (Pinsuti), "The cruiskeen lawn" (Stewart), which was encored, "The belfry tower" (J. L. Hatton), and "Meek twilight" (G. W. Martin), was very good, and reflected much credit on the Conductor, Mr. Joseph Monday. The programme closed with an excellent performance of the "Macbeth" music, the characters being sustained by the last five of the abovementioned artists. Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte.

On the 16th ult. the members of St. John's, Horselydown, Musical Association gave a Concert with full band, organ, pianoforte, and chorus, in the Queen Elizabeth Grammar School, kindly lent for the occasion by the Warden and Governors. Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata "The May Queen" was the work chosen for performance. The Rev. W. J. Batchelor, rector of St. John's, conducted, and, this being his first appearance in that capacity, he is to be congratulated on his success. The principal vocalists were Madame Mackway, Miss Carman, Mr. Kingston, and Mr. Green, who won much applause in the music entrusted to them. The Overture was well played by the band, as was also the lovely pageant music. Mr. J. C. Fimister presided at the organ, and Mr. Ernest Vivien, Organist of St. John's Church, Horselydown, at the pianoforte.

The members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association brought their present musical season to a close on the 13th ult. with a remarkably fine performance of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and a well selected miscellaneous second part. The principal vocalists were Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Henry Pope, who gave the greatest satisfaction. The choruses were rendered with power, precision, and finish, indicating very careful training on the part of the Conductor, Mr. Charles R. Green. The orchestra, which was highly efficient, was composed of members of the Royal Engineer Band. Mr. Howard Moss presided at the harmonium. The committee must be congratulated upon the effective manner in which Dvorák's grand work was rendered.

An Evening Concert was given by Miss Budden, on the r6th ult., in St. Mary's Mission Room, Hanley Road, Hornsey Rise. The soloists were Miss Wilkinson, Master Budden, Messrs. F. E. Hall, J. Newbold (vocalists), Mr. W. Newbold (violin), Mr. E. R. West, R.A.M. (pianoforte), and Mr. E. Collard (reciter). Miss Budden was encored for both her songs, "Phantoms" (H. C. Hiller) and "The old and the young Marie" (F. H. Cowen), Mr. E. R. West's pianoforte solos were much admired, and Miss Budden and Mr. E. R. West were efficient accompanists.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "The Messiah," in White-field's Tabernacle, Tottenham Court Road, on the 2st ult. The soloists were—Miss Edith Phillips, Mrs. Tuer, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. William Tate accompanied on the organ.

THE fifth Report of the Succentor, Dr. W. Sparrow Simpson, to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral. gives a highly satisfactory list of the music introduced during the two years over which this resumé extends. Services, anthems, and settings of the Benedicite by living and deceased composers have been carefully selected for performance; and mention is made of all the Festivals held within the Cathedral during the past year, a welldeserved meed of praise being awarded to the Organist, Dr. Stainer, for his indefatigable exertions in the cause. As a record of the musical work at St. Paul's this Report is highly valuable; and we are glad to find that copies of the document are eagerly sought for by the many who take interest in the progress of sacred music. Dr. Simpson requests us to state, in answer to numerous enquiries, that he has still some copies remaining, and that he will be happy to send one to any clergyman, precentor, or organist who may apply for it before the store of copies is exhausted (stamps for postage need not be sent). Letters should be addressed to the Succentor at 9, Amen Court, E.C. Gentlemen not receiving copies will be so good as to conclude that their applications have not arrived in time.

The Tufnell Park Choral Society gave a performance of Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," under the direction of Mr. W. Henry Thomas, on Thursday evening, the 23rd ult., in the Hall in Tufnell Park. The chorus consisted of nearly 100 voices, and there was a small band of sixteen performers (mostly strings), with the addition of a pianoforte (Mr. Frank Thomas) to supply the place of a few wind instruments. The Oratorio having been in careful rehearsal since the beginning of the year, and the members of the chorus being enthusiastic admirers of the work they had to do, the result was very satisfactory. The soloists were Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Nicholl, Mr. Puzey, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom sang in their best style, a special word of praise being due to them for the perfect rendering of the concerted music.

A SPECIAL Easter Festival Service was held in the Church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, on Wednesday evening, the 75th ult. The service opened with a careful rendering of Mendelssohn's Overture to "St. Paul," organ and orchestra. This was followed by as election from "The Messiah," admirably performed by an augmented choir and carefully selected band. Sullivan's Festival Te Deum followed, under the conductorship of Mr. Pitt, the choirmaster, and was excellently sung. The band was led by Mr. Arthur Payne, Mr. Arthur Miller presided at the organ, and Mr. John Jefferys at the pianoforte. Mdme. Worrell sustained the soprano part with her usual ability, and Mr. Alfred Moore, Mr. Chapman, and Mr. Weir, also sang well.

The Bromley (Kent) Choral and Orchestral Societies gave a performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" on the 28th ult., at the Bromley Drill Hall. The chorus and band, numbered upwards of 150 executants. The soloists were Miss Ada Patterson, Miss A. Kirby, Mr. Sidney Tower, and Mr. Bertram Latter. Amongst other items in the second part should be mentioned the Overture to "Egmont" (Bechoven), a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (F. E. Bache), and pianoforte solos, "Chants cans paroles" (Tschaikowsky) and "Rigaudon" (Raff), played by Mr. F. Lewis Thomas, who had as collaborateurs in the trio Mr. Payne and Mr. W. C. Hann. Mr. Thomas was as usual the Conductor.

A New Cantata, entitled "Maldwyn the Crusader" was produced in the St. John's Hall, Forest Hill, on the 20th ult. Mr. William L. Frost, the composer of the work, has earned a reputation as a writer for the pianoforte, and also produced an opera at the Haymarket Theatre some two years since, which was well spoken of by the London papers. "Maldwyn" is replete with pleasing melody, and the choral portions are especially effective. Miss Hettie Newman, Miss Alice Seymour, Mr. H. Carman, and Mr. Alfred Caink were thoroughly efficient in the solo parts. The choruses were sung with great precision by a choir of about forty voices.

THE Court of Common Council has recently resolved to erect a building on the Victoria Embankment, at a cost not exceeding £20,000, for the Guildhall School of Music.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Henry Barnby—one of the finest basses of his time, and for upwards of 8 years a lay clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor—which occurred at Slough on the 2nd ult. His funeral, in Clewer Churchyard, where his wife is buried, was attended by the Dean of Windsor, the Rev. W. Gilbert Edwards, the choir of St. George's Chapel, some of the children of the deceased, and his brothers, Mr. Thomas Barnby and Mr. Joseph Barnby. The sentences at the grave were read by Canon Carter, after which the hymn, "Jesus lives," was sung, "The Grace of our Lord" concluding this impressive ceremony.

The second of a series of Smoking Concerts was given in the School of Art, Bedford Park, on the 23rd ult., under the direction of Mr. C. J. Viner, Conductor of the Madrigal Society. Hatton's "Letter," Sullivan's "The Beleaguered," and Abt's "Vineta," were the glees, the last being redemanded. "The sailor's grave," sung by Mr. Cooke Yarborough, and "Hybrias the Cretan," given by Mr. W. E. Davis, R.A.M., were both encored. Mr. C. J. Viner's singing of Grossmith's sketch "The Parrot and the Cat," and Mr. Beck's recitations, were all excellent. Mr. E. L. Haywood, R.A.M., who played "Air de Ballet" (Jadassohn), acted as accompanist.

We announce with much regret the death of Mr. W. H. Holmes, which occurred on the afternoon of Thursday the 23rd ult. Mr. Holmes was nominated a student on the foundation, at the opening of the Royal Academy of Music, by his Majesty George IV., and obtained much eminence as a pianist. He was proud to style himself the "Father of the Academy," and as a Professor of the Institution, always took the warmest interest in the welfare of the pupils. For some time he had retired from the profession in consequence of failing health, and passed away tranquilly at an advanced age in the presence of his son-in-law, Mr. G. W. Hammond.

We are informed by the prospectus of the United Richard Wagner Society that the Association has already 181 branches and agencies in Europe and America, with a total of 5,124 members. The establishment of a London branch will, it is hoped, serve as a rallying point for the followers of the composer resident in this country; and it is proposed to continue the Lectures and Readings so successfully commenced last year, to which the members of the London branch will be admitted without payment. Special facilities will also be offered to them for attending prospective performances of Wagner's works at Bayreuth, should the funds of the Society permit.

A Large company assembled on the afternoon of the 25th ult., to inspect the buildings of the Albert Exhibition Palace, Batttersea. The promoters have evidently a sound belief in the rapid strides good music is making, for they apparently intend to make it one of their most prominent attractions. An excellent choir of 400 voices has been brought together by Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott, the musical director, and a selection, principally from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," was commendably performed. Mr. Hoyte gave a Recital on the magnificent organ, late the property of Mr. Holmes, and which forms a conspicuous feature in the Concert Hall.

THE Clapton Vocal Quartet, recently formed by Mr. W. M. Wait, and consisting of Messrs. Alfred W. Maycock (alto), John R. Hodgson (first tenor), Sidney C. Ratcliff (second tenor), and Alex. H. S. Burnett (bass), gave its first Evening Concert in the Manor Rooms, Hackney, on Monday, the 20th ult. Miss Alice Saunders (daughter of Dr. Gordon Saunders) and Miss Ellen Marchant were the lady ovocalists; Mrs. and Mr. Wait played pianoforte solos and duets, and also accompanied. The programme was well rendered under the direction of the Conductor, Mr. Wait.

MR. HAMILTON ROBINSON, on resigning the post of Organist and Choirmaster of Brunswick Episcopal Chapel, Hyde Park (which he has held for nearly six years), for that of St. Stephen's, South Kensington, was, at an interesting ceremony, on the 1st ult., presented with a handsome ebony silver-mounted bâton, bearing the inscription: "To Mr. Hamilton Robinson, F.C.O., from the Rev. E. W. Moore and Choir, 1885."

A CONCERT was given on the evening of the 14th ult., in the schoolroom attached to the Church of St. Saviour's, Brockley Hill. In the vocal department the chief honours fell to Mrs. A. Rosenthal, who sang with perfect intonation Gounod's "Ave Maria" (violin abbligato, Mr. T. E. Gatehouse); to Madame Schlüter in Randegger's "Only for One," and to Herr Carl Bernhard in an aria by Rossini. Miss Von Kornatzki, an excellent pianist, played selections from the works of Henselt, Scharwenka, and Mendelssohn, and Mr. T. E. Gatehouse performed on the violin solos by Dancla and Hauser, and a "Mazurka de Salon" of his own composition.

MR. JOSEPH HEALD gave an Evening Concert on the 16th ult. in the Town Hall, Wandsworth, which was well attended, and highly successful. Mr. Heald was assisted by the Misses Coward, Rees, Damian, Cole, and Roberts, Messrs. McKay and W. Mills, vocalists; Master Saunders, violin; Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, violoncello; the Misses A. Aloof, R. Ayers, and A. Mopsey, Messrs. E. M. Flavell and G. H. Heydemann, pianists. The Conductors were Messrs T. A. Wallworth, E. M. Flavell, and Signor Tartaglione.

A VERY successful Concert was given in Brixton Hall, on Good Friday evening, under the able direction of Madame Jeannette Price, a deservedly popular South London vocalist. The vocalists were Madame Riechelman, Miss Rose Moss, Miss Nellie Price, Mr. Joseph Pearce, Mr. Edward Mills, and Mr. Edward Thelenberg; Miss Eleanor Hobbs, solo pianist; Miss Emily Hardy, solo violinist, and Mr. H. W. Clarkson and Mr. James Hallé accompanists, the latter gentleman playing Batiste's Grand Offertoire in D with much effect.

The members of the Walworth Choral Society gave a performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday evening, before a crowded and appreciative audience. The solos were well rendered by Madame Lita Jarratt, Miss Annie Gatland, Mr. John Cornwall, and Mr. Frank May, the last named gentleman receiving quite an ovation for his rendering of "Why do the Nations." The choruses were well sung. Mr. F. Crome acted as leader, Mr. W. W. Crome presided at the harmonium, and Mr. W. E. Curtis conducted.

A VERY successful performance of Handel's "Messiah" was given at the Victoria Hall, Waterloo Road, on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult. The choir was large and efficient, and many of the choruses were very finely sung. A full and competent orchestra added much to the success of the evening. The solos were all well rendered by Miss Adelaide Mullen, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. A. Montague Shepherd, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. Mrs. A. J. Layton, F.C.O., accompanied, and Mr. Henry A. Evans conducted.

ON Good Friday the Hackney Choral Society gave a performance of "The Messiah" at the Morley Hall, Hackney. The soloists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Janet G. Sneddon, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Henry Pope. The choir of the Society, numbering over 100 voices, sang the choruses in an excellent manner; and the band, led by Mr. Henry Baynton, was highly efficient. Mr. Thomas H. Warner was the Conductor, and Mr. E. A. Coombs the Organist.

A PERFORMANCE of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at Christ Church, Crouch End, on the 16th ult., in aid of the Choir Fund. The chorus consisted of about eighty voices. The solos were well rendered by Mrs. Alfred Dye, Miss A. Scott, Miss Long, and Messrs. Reginald Groome and T. R. Johnson. There was a large congregation. The accompaniments were excellently played by Mr. F. A. W. Docker, Organist of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A.Mus., T.C.L., conducted

THE members of the Royal Albany Choir gave an Invitation Concert to members and friends at the Neumeyer Hall, on the 18th ult. In addition to solos by members of the choir and some part-songs, the following artists assisted:—Miss H. Morgan, Mrs. S. Capon, Mr. Ernest A. Williams, and Herr Karl Halm (Pianoforte).

THE death is announced of Mr. Arthur Howell, the well-known double-bass player and vocalist.

"YE Oak-Town Singing Men," a local Society in Acton for the performance of glees, &c., for male voices, gave an excellent Concert at South Acton, on Wednesday, the 15th ult. The soloists were Madame Bonner, Mr. A. H. Hoole, and Mr. R. Russell; violin, Mr. M. R. Duff; pianoforte, Miss Jennings; accompanist, Mr. T. Holtham, and Conductor, Mr. T. Curry, Organist and Choirmaster, All Saints', South Acton.

THE Finsbury Park Orchestral Society gave a Concert in the Iron Room of Holy Trinity Church, Stroud Green, on March 27, the programme including Haydn's Symphony in D, No. 7, an Overture by Boieldieu, and several lighter pieces. Songs were contributed by Miss Lizzie Jones and Mr. Haydn Grover. Mr. H. J. Dean, besides conducting the band and accompanying the vocalists, played a violin solo. The room was crowded.

AT St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on Friday, March 27, and on Good Friday at Evensong, performances of the Prologue and the first part of Gounod's "Redemption" were given by the Choir, with orchestra and organ accompaniments. The church was densely crowded. The organ was played by Mr. J. E. Vernham, of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, and Mr. Hamilton Robinson, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Stephen's, conducted.

THE Lavender Hill Choral Society gave its second Amateur Concert on the 14th ult., when a large number of members contributed to the programme, including Miss Ross, Miss Stammers, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Ortner. A violin and pianoforte duet by Mr. and Miss Bird was much appreciated, and several part-songs were well rendered. The Conductor was Mr. J. R. Jekyll and the accompaniments were played by Miss Minnie Bird.

SPECIAL Choral Services were held at Christ Church, Bermondsey, on Easter Sunday, on the occasion of the re-opening of the organ after repairs. Elvey's anthem "Praise the Lord" and King's Service in F were sung, and appropriate sermons preached by the Vicar, the Rev. Lees Bell, M.A. Mr. Stretton Swann presided at the organ, and played a selection from the works of Handel, Mendelssohn, Morandi, &c., at both services.

A HANDSOME marble timepiece, a beautifully bound copy of Rimbault and Hopkins's "History of the Organ," and an illuminated address were, on the 13th ult., presented to Mr. Eardley Phillips by his numerous friends and admirers on his retirement, after twenty-two years' service, from the post of Organist and Choirmaster of St. Stephen's Church, South Lambeth. We are informed that the late choir of that church is about to be formed into a Choral Society.

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given on the 14th ult., at the St. John's Rooms, Hoxton, under the direction of Mr. J. W. Harris. The vocalists were Miss Nettie Wood, Miss J. Ritchie, Miss Heath, Miss Kate Abson, Mr. W. C. Butler and Mr. Edwyn Bishop; Mr. J. Anderson (violin), and Mr. Bond (clarinet). Miss Mary Gadsby ably presided at the pianoforte.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has been graciously pleased, through Sir Henry Ponsonby, to grant Mr. A. J. Caldicott, the Director of Music at the new Albert Palace, permission to introduce the Choral "Gotha," composed by the late Prince Consort, in the ode specially written by Mr. Barrett which will be performed at the inaugural ceremony.

The Norwood and Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave a selection from "St. Paul," at the Institute, on the 22nd ult. The solos were effectively rendered by Miss F. Thompson, Miss Kate Wilson, Messrs, F. Bromley, and Ernest A. Williams, and the band and chorus showed careful training on the part of their Conductor, Mr. Carey.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. John's Church, Waterloo Bridge Road, on the rst uit. The soloists were Miss von Hennig, Mrs. Dean, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

It has been decided by the Executive Council to have Choral and Brass Band competitions in connection with the International Inventions Exhibition. These competitions will take place about September next. Miss Florence May, after a protracted visit to Germany, has returned to London for the season. Shortly before leaving Berlin she had the honour of being invited to play at a Soirée given by their Imperial Highnesses the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, when she per-formed pieces of Rameau and Chopin, and, by desire of the Crown Princess, some of her own pianoforte compositions.

MADAMB FRICKENHAUS and Herr Josef Ludwig announce that they will resume their Chamber Concerts at the Princes Hall, Piccadilly, on Thursday evening, the 14th inst.; the dates of the three following Concerts being Thursdays, the 28th inst., June 11 and 25. The programmes will include the works of the old masters and modern compositions of special interest.

THE last Entertainment of the present season at the Brompton Hospital took place on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., when a good programme was well rendered by Miss Amy Foster, assisted by Miss Fanny Moody, Miss Hyde, Mr. Lance Calkin, and Mr. Randulph Coward, Miss Foster was solo pianist and accompanist. The Concert was one of the most successful of the season.

THE new Easter piece entitled "Hobbies," produced at Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, derives much of its attraction from the brightness and melodiousness of some appropriate music by Mr. George Gear. A song (well sung by Miss Fanny Holland) is exceedingly good, and usually secures an encore.

THE new organ, built by Alfred Monk, London, for Kelvedon Parish Church, Essex, was opened by Mr. Higgs on the 9th ult. The organ contains nine stops in great organ, nine stops in swell, three stops in pedal organ, and three couplers. All stops have the full compass, and there are four sixteen feet stops complete.

WE have much pleasure in announcing that Antonin Dvorák's "Patriotic Hymn," to be produced at the Benefit Concert of Mr. Geaussent on the 13th inst., at St. James's Hall, will positively be conducted by the composer, who remains in England for the purpose.

AT the Parish Church of St. Mary, Balham, on Easter Day, at the 9 a.m. High Celebration, a new service in D composed by E. H. Ryde, Esq., was sung for the first time. Mr. H. W. Weston, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ.

THE last meeting of the Committee of the Peck Testimonial Fund was held on the 23rd ult., when it was announced that the subscriptions amounted to a total of £,294 12s. 6d. This sum will be, therefore, at once handed to Mr. Peck.

In a Convocation held at Oxford on the 25th ult., the honorary degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon Herr Hans Richter. A Concert was afterwards given by the Richter Orchestra in the Sheldonian Theatre.

BACH's " Passion Music" (St. Matthew) was performed in York Minster during Lent in six weekly portions. The services were largely attended, and the music produced a profound impression.

According to report issued just before going to press, Sir Julius Benedict continues slowly to improve.

REVIEWS.

Gretry. Sa vie et ses Œuvres. Par Michel Brenet. [Paris: Gauthier Villars. 1884.]

THE personality and artistic career of André Ernest Modeste Grétry-the true founder of French comic opera, the philosophical author, the freethinker and ardent republican-are sufficiently attractive in themselves, moreover associated with one of the most remarkable and eventful periods in the history of France, to constitute it a matter of wonder that no biography of the master, worthy of that name, should as yet have been attempted on the part of any French music historian. More than seventy years have elapsed since the death of Grétry, who, although a Belgian by birth, is claimed to be her own by France as proudly, and with as just a reason, though in a different that refinement of style, artistic treatment, and feeling for sphere of the art, as Handel is claimed by England. Some | melody which characterise the works of this writer.

three years ago, however, the Académie Royale de Belgique, anxious to fill the existing void in musico-biographical literature, and animated moreover by patriotic sentiments, offered a substantial prize for "a critical essay concerning the life and works of Grétry." M. Brenet has been the gainer of that prize with the present volume, which, let it be said at once, admirably fulfils the requirements set forth by the Académie. It is an "essay" occupying some two hundred and eighty pages, not an elaborate biography; albeit a valuable contribution towards such work in the future. It is a "critical essay," since in its pages the writer displays considerable judgment both in the sifting of his material and in the critical observations concerning the more important compositions of his hero. And, finally, the "life and works" of Grétry are here dealt with in equal proportions, due prominence being given to the leading epochs in the composer's career. A more succinct, and, within its self-imposed limits, exhaustive musical monography we have indeed rarely met with. In this respect, as in several others, M. Brenet's treatment of his subject compares most favourably with the more elaborate but somewhat rambling work of his competitor for the above prize, M. Grégoir, published in 1883. Having already, in our review of the latter, furnished an outline of the main circumstances attending the composer's life, we abstain from doing so again on this occasion, referring the reader to M. Brenet's ably told narrative itself, in the course of which the author succeeds in clearing away several hitherto existing errors and traditional myths. Although no attempt is made in so limited a space to furnish anything approaching to a historical background, sufficient indications are given to enable the otherwise well-informed reader to supply this necessary adjunct to the appreciation of the life-picture of an artist who was the protégé of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, some of whose operas were written amidst the terrible scenes accompanying the great Revolution of 1789, and on whom, subsequently, honours were bestowed by the offspring of that revolution, Napoleon the first. A chronological catalogue of the works of Grétry (including no less than fifty-six complete operas and opéra-ballets) appended to this volume, together with an enumeration of the books and pamphlets, &c., consulted by the author, and a detailed index of the contents of every chapter, complete the usefulness of M. Brenet's work, and render it a very valuable book of reference as to facts hitherto not easily available, in addition to its general merits as a biographical essay. M. Brenet, though a young author, has already acquired some reputation as such in his thoughtful "Histoire de la Symphonie à Orchestre," published in 1882, and much good and solid work may be anticipated from his pen in the future.

The Red King. Choral Ballad for Male Voices. The words written by the Rev. Charles Kingsley. The music composed by Alice Mary Smith (Mrs. Meadows White). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first posthumous work of this gifted representative English female composer is now before us, and increases our regret that an artist so earnest and truthful in her musical settings of high class poetry should have passed from amongst us. Like the same composer's "Song of the Little Baltung" (also to Kingsley's words), the dramatic feeling of the ballad is admirably preserved, without any undue straining after sensational effect, and the writing throughout is clear and faithfully reflective of the text. The opening chorus, commencing with a Symphony alternating between G minor and major, well prepares the ear for the bold vocal subject in the major, expressive of the Red King's carouse in Malwood Hall, the baritone solo of the Monk, and the defiant solo of the King, with the relation of his dream, containing some excellent dramatic points. The progress of the story—the shooting of William Rufus by Tyrrel—is musically coloured with much fidelity, the fall of the King and the flight of Tyrrel-the latter related in a graphic choral piece, interspersed with solo quartet-being especially worthy of commendation. The chorus, "And fend our princes every one," most effectively concludes the composition, which, as we have already indicated, contains all any Choral Society where reliable male voices, both for solos and choruses, can be commanded, "The Red King" "show pieces," which prevailed for so many years, that will prove an inestimable boon; and even for drawing-writers of "drawing-room" compositions will scarcely be room performance, with a moderately good pianist, it cannot fail to prove highly effective.

Children's Songs, and How to sing them. By Wm. L. Tomlins. [Boston: Oliver Ditson and Co.]

In The Musical Times for July, 1883, we drew attention to the system of training the voices of children adopted by Mr. Tomlins, who had at that time between two and three hundred young people under his instruction at Chicago, and quoted the opinion of Mr. Theodore Thomas upon the result of an exhibition of his class. We have now before us a volume containing not only a clear exposition of his method of teaching, but a number of songs excellently adapted in every respect both for the voices and capacities of children. A careful perusal of the book has convinced us that the author has thoroughly realised the difficulties which juvenile vocalists would be likely to encounter, and therefore carefully smoothed the path for them, so that they may at first be led easily into the right road. The Exercises are evidently the result of mature thought; and many of them are rendered additionally attractive by suggestions as to the desirability of allying the notes with some little incident or story, a plan often most successfully pursued by the author in his classes. Several of his pupils, he tells us, were able to recognise and name most of the scale notes as he sang them. "They were also taught to appreciate impulses of time, to reduce them into fractions of a beat, or to divide them into measures and phrases, and to execute these various rhythms absolutely without the music is pleasing, and the majority of listeners, therethe sense of physical effort, which is so baneful." Confore, will be satisfied. We like "Meeting" much better, sidering that these children had received only two lessons a week for nine months; there can be little doubt that Mr. Tomlins has almost revolutionised the system of elementary vocal tuition; and we earnestly commend his work to the attention of all interested in the subject on this side of the Atlantic, as well as in the country where he first preached his doctrines.

Gavottes, Minuets, Fugues, and other short Pieces for the Piano. By Samuel Butler and Henry Festing Jones. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE authors of these compositions have hitherto been known only in literature; and as this is their first appeal in music, they will, we are certain, thank us for being candid in our criticism upon their efforts. Let us at once say that in many of the Gavottes and Minuets, not only much good musical feeling is displayed, but a very fair knowledge of writing, the reproduction of the Handelian style being, especially in the Minuets, very happily attempted. Fugues, however, demand severe study; and before writing more of these, good models should be carefully dissected. For example, that commencing on page 7, beginning on the dominant, demands a tonal answer; but, even passing lightly over this point, when the subject is re-introduced. instead of prolonging the dominant harmony, and resolving upon the tonic in the following bar, the theme commences upon a 6-4, and the two parts in the upper line proceed upwards in perfect fifths. The fugues, too, are but slightly developed, yet in much of the counterpoint sufficient indication is given of a power which makes us desirous of again meeting with composers evidently so earnestly anxious to increase the store of music moulded on the classical forms.

Classics (Ancient and Modern) for the Pianoforte. Selected and fingered by Arthur O'Leary. [Edwin Ashdown.]

It is a healthy sign of the times that the term "classical" no longer frightens those who call themselves lovers of music, and that the word is now accepted as meaning not only works written in the latter part of the last century, moulded on the forms which were then generally received but those composed in the present day according to the models bequeathed to us. The exact signification then of Mr. O'Leary's "Classics, Ancient and Modern," can be thoroughly understood; and amongst the twelve numbers of the series now under notice nobody will be surprised regulated by the demand, it is a proof of the desire of to find several pieces by living composers. A fondness instrumental and vocal students to understand the various enabled to find a drawing-room in which to exhibit their productions, and musical "fireworks" will be kept for those special audiences, the astonishment and wonder of which may for a short time prolong their existence. The works already published in the collection now before us comprise several as yet little known, but with which we are certain many pianists will be too glad to make acquaintance. Some judicious remarks upon phrasing-and especially upon the much misunderstood slur-by the editor, are printed upon each piece; and wherever any difficulty is likely to occur, the leading fingering is given. We cordially commend this series of classical pieces both to teachers and pupils, and sincerely congratulate Mr. O'Leary upon the able manner in which he has performed his task.

Wait. Song. Meeting. Song. Written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by Franz Abt. [Frederick Pitman.]

THE composer of these songs has produced so many excellent specimens of vocal music as to make us tolerably certain that everything from his pen will contain the elements of popularity. "Wait" and "Meeting," if somewhat conventional, are at least melodious, and good enough to sustain, if not to add to, his reputation. In the firstnamed composition we cannot say that we much like the waltz movement as a musical expression of the pain of parting and the hope of brighter days in the future; but not only because the music sympathises with the words, but because the song is more artistically treated throughout. The opening theme, in A minor, has a well-contrasted melody in the tonic major; but the crotchet accompaniment continued throughout the composition becomes somewhat monotonous.

The Violin: its famous Makers and their Imitators. By George Hart. [Dulau and Co.]

In the preface to the present "enlarged and revised edition" of Mr. Hart's book, the author says, "The favourable reception accorded to the previous editions of this work has not only added greatly to the pleasure attending the preparation of a new and revised edition, but has encouraged me to spare no effort within my power to render the volume as interesting and complete as possible. In making these endeavours the bulk of the book has been necessarily increased by additional information, spread over all the sections of the work, but chiefly on those which treat of the Early History of the leading instrument, and the Italian branches of the subject." In connection with the Italian divisions of the book, information not only interesting, but of the highest historical value, will be found, the greater part of this matter having been obtained from original MSS. belonging to the trustees of the Civic Museum, at Cremona, which Institution is located in the palace bequeathed to the citizens, together with its contents, by the Marchese Ponzoni. It would be impossible in noticing a volume of such dimensions to do more than draw attention to its value as a work of reference on every subject connected with what the author terms, truly enough, the "leading instrument," for the mere table of We may say, however, that the exquisite illustrations of instruments of varied styles are alone so powerful an attraction that, apart from the fund of information contained in the work, all real lovers of the violin should possess themselves of a copy, so that they can daily feast their eyes upon such excellent representations of the masterpieces of all the most

Dictionary of Musical Terms. Harmony Catechism

By Edwin M. Lott. [Edwin Ashdown.]

WE are glad to find Dictionaries of Musical Terms multiplying, for, as in commerce the supply is generally terms used in printed music, instead of either disregarding throughout. Against it nothing can be said, but we notice them or applying to a master for an explanation of their meaning. Mr. Lott's little Catechism is, on the whole, extremely clear; but we certainly cannot agree with him that "a tre corde" indicates "the use of the loud pedal in pianoforte playing." Indeed there is no "loud pedal" at all; for what is often called so merely raises the dampers, and therefore prolongs the sound. "A tre corde" means take off the soft pedal, the use of which is indicated by the words una corda. We always treat Harmony Catechisms tenderly, because there are so many "systems" in the present day that a mere intelligent exposition of the generally admitted rules of the science for popular use may be allowed to pass muster without too rigid scrutiny. the book before us, however, we must protest against what Mr. Lott terms the "Chord of the Pluperfect Six-four," on the subdominant, being exhibited to students; and we beg to say that this chord is also used upon the Super-tonic, as well as upon the Dominant and Tonic. Again, is it good to give a sequence of prepared sevenths, commencing with one unprepared, as at page 34? and, upon any rational system, can it be said that "all intervals chromatically sharpened should ascend, and all those chromatically flattened should descend in the next chord?" Of course we have many other objections to make to the explanations in this Catechism; but these involve differences of opinion upon points of theory, and we have confined ourselves, therefore, to comments upon those which appear to us untenable upon any theory at all.

An Evening Service in F. By James Fitzgerald. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. FITZGERALD, an organist at Kidderminster, has furnished a commendable setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, for the most part in the solid church style. Choirmasters, however, may be deterred from using it by a singular florid passage on the word "rejoiced." The two bars in which it occurs might be eliminated without much trouble. There is another slight flaw, namely, the accentuation of the syllable "with" in the sentence "world without end." Many church composers are careless in matters of this kind.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 46, Four Short Voluntaries. By Kate Westrop.

[Novello, Ewer & Co.]

It is not often that organ pieces by a lady composer come under our notice, but the king of instruments, like the violin, is now being extensively studied by the fair sex, and Miss Westrop is evidently a proficient executant, for she is Organist of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard That she is also a talented, as well as an accomplished musician, these voluntaries amply prove. stand quite apart from ordinary compositions of this kind, that is to say, mere studies in syncopations, with here and there a melody in watery imitation of Mendelssohn. Miss Westrop writes with brightness and piquancy, at the same time avoiding the flippancy of the French school. True, in the fourth number there is a strong suggestiveness of the fashionable gavotte style, but the piece is not too secular for church use. The gem of the series is No. 2, a charmingly melodious trifle, but the whole of them are extremely pleasing and musicianly, and the composer may be encouraged to try her hand at more ambitious work.

The Morning and Evening Service, with the Communion Office, in C. By B. Luard Selby, Op. 24. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This Service includes a setting of the Benedictus as well as the Jubilate, and the Communion Service includes the Benedictus and Agnus Dei. Mr. Selby's style is bright, but at the same time broad and diatonic. In its general character it may be said to be thoroughly English, that is to say, it is wholly free from the sensuous and sentimental effects which some church composers introduce, taking example from their brethren in France. It is curious to note the diversities in matters of accent in even simple settings of the canticles, due perhaps as much to want of thought as design. Most composers say "We praise Thee O God," while Mr. Selby says "We praise Thee," and this preference for accenting the pronoun is discernable a slip in the clause "Being of one substance, &c." Here the accent should be on "one" and not on "of" or " substance."

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, for Male Voices. By Frederick Iliffe, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In cathedral and collegiate churches a commendable custom is beginning to obtain of giving the juvenile choristers a rest on one day of the week. A demand is, therefore, arising for service music arranged for voices without trebles. Dr. Iliffe also dispenses with the countertenor, his Service being written for two tenors and two basses. It is characterised by considerable vigour and brightness, with a good deal of independent work for the organ, and is essentially modern, alike in harmony and phraseology, but without any secularity of feeling.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A resumé of the performances in commemoration of the Handel Bi-centenary recently held in the composer's native country will doubtless be of interest to many of our readers. We give the performances in alphabetical order, but without any pretence to completeness, as follows:-

for string orchestra; and "Alexander's Feast."

Weber's "Sylvana," in its revised form, has now also been placed in the répertoire of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, where it was twice produced, with very great success, during March last. To give an idea of the activity of this excellent institution we may enumerate its remaining performances during the same month—viz., "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen" (Nessler), "Genoveva" (Schumann), "Le part du diable" (Auber), "Undine" (Lortzing), "Das Nachtlager von Granada" (Kreutzer), "Der Haideschacht" (Holstein), "Les deux Journées" (Cherubini), "Oberón" (Weber), "Fidelio" (Beethoven), "Le Nozze di Figaro" (Mozart), and "Lohengrin," "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser" (Wagner). Surely the subscribers have no reason to complain of an absence of variety, the performances, moreover, being characterised by a high degree of general

A revival of Weber's early opera or operetta "Abu Hassan," is in course of preparation at the Royal Opera of Berlin; a fresh instance of the newly awakened interest in Germany as regards the earlier productions of the im-mediate forerunner of the author of the "Kunstwerk der

Zukunft.'

The following is the programme of the Music Festival to be held at Bonn, from the 28th to the 30th of July next, under the direction of Herren Max Bruch and L. the local musik-director-viz., secular oratorio, "Achilles' from the "Iliad", compiled by Dr. Bluthaupt), by Max (from the "Iliad", compiled by Dr. Bluthaupt), by Max Bruch; Handel's "Alexander's Feast," several works by Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, and others. Soloists Mesdames Schröder-Haufstängl, Joachim, Bruch, Herren Emil Götze, Georg Henschel, and Eugen d'Albert. The chorus to consist of an amalgamation of the choirs of Cologne, Barmen, Bonn, &c., and the orchestra to be recruited by the forces available at Wiesbaden, Frankfurt, Cologne, and Hanover. Altogether the Festival bids fair to be an exceptionally fine one.

The pianoforte score of Weber's "Sylvana," in its new version by Herren Pasqué and Langer (previously referred to in these columns), has just been published by P. J.

Tonger, of Cologne.

Place aux Dames! A somewhat curious, and, we may add, amusing result has waited on the prize competition recently instituted by a German publisher for the poetry to a "Studenten Lied" (Students' Song), the gainer of the valuable silver goblet offered by the promoter having been a lady, Fräulein Frida Schanz, of Dresden. The verses are written with poetic feeling, and are pervaded by a spirit of conviviality, which cannot fail to be appreciated by German undergraduates. A fresh prize has now been offered in the same quarter, for the best musical composition of Fräulein Schanz's verses, which we may suggest, pending the decision of the jury, are admirably adapted to the music of Schumann's spirited song "Wohlauf, noch getrunken den funkelnden Wein."

A posthumous opera entitled "Noah," by Halévy, to which the composer's son-in-law, the late Georges Bizet, had put the finishing touches, was brought out on the 5th ult. at Carlsruhe, without, however, achieving more than a succés d'estime.

At the last Gewandhaus Concert of the present season (March 26) Madame Clara Schumann played her late husband's Pianoforte Concerto, amidst the enthusiastic admiration of her audience, who were unanimous in testifying to the unabated vigour of the greatest of lady pianists. Other numbers in the programme were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, and the same master's C minor Symphony. Dr. Reinecke conducted an exceptionally fine performance.

Herr Friedrich Chrysander, the German biographer of Handel, has received the following telegram from Prince Bismarck on the occasion of the second centenary of the birth of the great composer with whom his name is so honourably associated:-" My heartiest wishes are due to you at to-day's jubilee of the great Handel, as his most worthy representative, and I sincerely trust that you may live to accomplish the completion of the national work you have undertaken on his behalf.

Herr Richard Schmidt, the Berlin Musik-Director and Principal of the "Schmidtsche Conservatorium." has been Verein, lately vacated by Herr W. Handwerg.

The bi-centenary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach was celebrated last month at his native place, Eisenach, in an appropriate manner. The statue of the great composer, as well as the house where he was born, had been profusely adorned with garlands and spring flowers, while at St. George's Church a festive Concert took place, consisting entirely of compositions of the giant master of polyphony, and of his son, Johann Christoph Bach. shall refer more in detail to the Bach commemoration in Germany in our next number.

Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Scotch" Rhapsody was recently performed (for the second time) at one of the "Sinfonie Concerts" at Düsseldorf, under the direction of Herr R. Zerbe, where, as on the former occasion, it was greatly appreciated.

A Music Festival is to be held at La Côte Saint-André, the native place of Hector Bérlioz, on June 21, in connection with the proposed ceremony of affixing a commemorative tablet at the house where that eminent composer first saw the light.

A posthumous Opera, by the late Victor Massé, entitled "Une Nuit de Cléopatre," was produced at the Opéra Comique, Paris, on the 25th ult. Madame Heilbron was admirable in the part of Cleopatra, and the interpretation of the work generally left little to be desired.

Mdlle. Van Zandt, the young prima donna who, as our readers will remember, was unfortunate enough to contribute a page to the chronique scandaleuse, of the French capital last year, has recently re-appeared at the Opéra Comique in Leo Délibes's "Lakmé." The first occasion of her presenting herself again before a Paris audience, after the incident alluded to, was marked by scarcely any signs of an unfriendly disposition on the part of the audience, the lady being, in fact, generally well received. At the second and third performances, however, tumultuous disturbances took place, and the young singer was practically hissed off the stage, and has since been forced to cancel her contract with the manager of the theatre. The love of scandal on the part of Parisians is well known, but its vindictive side has scarcely ever been illustrated in so prominent a manner.

Adalbert von Goldschmidt's Oratorio "The Seven Cardinal Sins" was performed on March 27, at one of the Concerts of M. Lamoureux, at Paris, with a conspicuous success, all the more remarkable since the work is of a very solemn character.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony was performed on the 12th ult., at the Paris Concerts Modernes, under direction of M. B. Godard, where it was very favourably received.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" continues to attract the attention and enthusiastic support of amateurs at the Theâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels.

An international Musical Congress is to be held at Antwerp in connection with the forthcoming world-exhibition at that town. Invitations are being issued by the Circle Artistique Littéraire et Scientifique, of Antwerp, with a view to the discussion of such questions as the adoption of a uniform system of musical training; of an international musical diapason, and other matters of equal importance to all professors of the art.

Anton Rubinstein's latest opera, "Nero," was performed for the first time at the Imperial Opera House of Vienna on the 21st ult. The work, which was exceedingly well mounted, failed, however, to create much enthusiasm, although the composer was called several times.

Herr Emmerich Kastner, the well-known specialist in matters Wagnerian, is about to publish a number of interesting letters, written by the poet-composer during the period from 1830 to 1883, the great majority of which will be entirely new to the public.

The Philharmonic Concerts of Vienna celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their existence on the 12th ult. by an appropriate festive performance, including Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

secretary to the institution, have been elected by the share-holders of the Metropolitan Theatre of New York to succeed that gentleman in the management of the German Opera so successfully inaugurated last season. The question of a continuance of the undertaking in the coming autumn has thus been satisfactorily settled, and we heartily wish it every success. Funds are being raised by subscription in New York for erecting a monument over the grave of the much-lamented Dr. Damrosch.

The first performance in Italy of Handel's "Judas Macgiven at Turin by the Stefano Tempia Choral Society, in March last (and alluded to in our last number), has been followed by a repetition of the oratorio, under the same auspices, on the 19th ult. The room, as our Turin correspondent informs us, was crowded to excess, and there was every indication on the part of the audience of the great interest aroused by the production of this noble work. We are glad also to notice from a circular addressed to the members of the above Society that the English inhabitants of Turin have in a special manner expressed their gratitude to the zealous promoter of these performances, Signor Giulio Roberti, who has already done so much towards fostering a taste for the classical masterpieces of all ages and countries in his native Italy.

We have received the first number of Vol. Leipziger Korrespondenzblatt, a weekly journal, a portion of which is in future to be devoted to the subject of music and the music-trade.

We have to record the death, on March 31, at Wiesbaden, of Franz Abt, a notice of whose life will be found in another column. A committee has already been formed at the instance of the Choral Societies of Brunswick and Wiesbaden for the purpose of erecting a monument to the deceased composer ..

At Vienna died, on March 31, Philipp Fahrbach, a pupil of Lanner, senior, the celebrated composer of dances, and himself a popular contributor to that species of music, as well as to some other branches of the art.

One of the most esteemed veteran musicians of Berlin, Professor Julius Schneider, distinguished alike as a composer and teacher of his art, died on Good Friday last, at the mature age of eighty.

The death is announced, at Stockholm, on March 29, of Ludwig Norman, the husband of the eminent violinist, Madame Norman-Néruda, much esteemed in his native Sweden, and elsewhere, as a composer of considerable merit. He had reached his 55th year.

At Dresden died, on March 24, Aloys Tausig, the father of Carl Tausig, the celebrated pianist, whose early instructor he had been, and whose premature death had in a great measure blighted the great artistic qualities and eminent teaching capacity possessed by his father. He expired at the age of sixty-seven.

The Graphic announces the death, on the 8th ult., at the age of sixty-four, of Emmons Hamlin, of the Boston firm of Mason and Hamlin. "There is a dispute as to who was the inventor of the free reed instrument now known as the American organ, but Mr. Hamlin was undisputably one of its first introducers, and he was the patentee of several valuable improvements.'

The death is also announced, at Milan, of Margherita Schira, an operatic singer of great reputation, for whom Morlacchi and Mercadante wrote special parts in several of their operas. The deceased prima donna had reached the mature age of eighty-two.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSICAL DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-We are so often told that a man's fate is in his own hands, while our daily experience shows us that it is very largely in the hands of other people, that I have thought of craving your permission to lay before my fellow members of the profession, in your columns, a few dry facts connected with my subject, and to show that this "res honorabilis" (a musical degree) is by no means so easily obtained as some people imagine. Of course, I am not

The son of the late Dr. Damrosch and Mr. Stanton, late examination demanded by the Boards of Examiners; for, without this, the coveted distinction would not be worth the having, and a whole crowd of impostors would suddenly start up with Mus. Bac., or Mus. Doc., or F.C.O. at the end of their names. But my proposition is this:-A professional degree, which, to a great extent, is a proof of professional competency, is kept out of the reach of many a man who is, perhaps, really more competent to hold it than several who have won and still wear the distinction.

I will mention a few things which, to my own knowledge (and I lay claim to very little practical acquaintance with Boards of Examiners), are keeping back many an ambitious musician, anxious to distinguish himself, but forbidden by circumstances:-

First of all comes money, in the shape of fees. At Trinity College, in Dublin, the fees for the degree of Bachelor in Music amount, I believe, to £35, and those for the degree of Doctor are something like £45. Oxford and Cambridge, I presume, follow in the same suit. Comment is unnecessary.

In Dublin, there is the Royal Irish University, whose fees (really merely nominal) are as follows :-

> r. Matriculation ... £1 0 0 2. First University Examination ... I 3. First Musical Examination ... T 0 0 4. For Bachelor's Degree ... 5. For Doctor's Degree ...

This is admirable, no doubt; but the pleasant aspect of the picture changes somewhat when we consider that between each of these examinations one whole year must elapse, and two years between the penultimate and the final ones. So that, if an already thoroughly trained musician, who could pass his doctor's examination tomorrow, turns his eyes in this direction, he will discover that he has to virtually retire pro tem. to the rear ranks and work side by side with, perhaps, some of his own pupils; and then he may blossom forth a Mus. Doc. at the end of six years.

But this is not all. Degrees in music appear not to be in the least degree designed for the benefit of those men, professional musicians, whose security and advancement should be the sole raison d'être of all such distinctions; for subjects not in the remotest degree connected with the art are put before him as necessary for his success. man might reasonably enough hope to win his degree if he passed a good searching examination in harmony, counterpoint of all kinds, form, instrumentation, æsthetics, acoustics, and the playing of one or more standard instruments. But, forsooth, if he reads the Calendar of say this one University alone, he will find that, practically, no man is to be considered an educated musician who cannot translate Cæsar, Virgil, Homer, Voltaire, and Racine, answer questions in Roman History, work out a score of problems in Euclid, show himself well "up" in algebra, discourse learnedly about hydrostatics and electricity, and so on with half-adozen other subjects, not one of which has the least bearing upon his professional career or competence. course, those men who have gone straight from school or college to the Examination Hall, and had no polishing or cramming to do in such subjects, may uphold this system as being calculated to maintain the respectability of the profession. But surely they must know that there are many who leave school at the age of seventeen or eighteen who have no opportunity of going up for a professional degree until they reach the age of perhaps thirty-five years, and then find their path blocked because in the midst of eighteen or twenty years' hard professional toil their linguistic and mathematical acquirements have nearly died Trusting that some more qualified individual than myself will raise the siege in this matter and agitate for a reform, I enclose my card, and sign myself,

Sir, Yours very truly, QUÆRO JUSTITIAM. April 6, 1885.

DR. STAINER'S LECTURE.

SIR,-In your notice of Dr. Stainer's lecture on Psalm and Hymn Tunes, I observe a paragraph from which it would seem either that there is an error in your report or alluding to the stumbling block (to many) of a stiff searching that Dr. Stainer simply repeated the ordinary mistaken accounts derived from Burney, Hawkins and others. The point does not in the least affect the value of Dr. Stainer's remarks, but as it has been lately fully elucidated, it would be well that old errors should no longer be perpetuated especially on such authority as that of Dr. Stainer. I need only say here that the "Old Hundredth" tune did not exist in 1542. It was composed (partly out of older materials) by Louis Bourgeois, and was first published, as a melody only, in the enlarged edition of the Genevan Psalter, 1551.

There is not a shadow of evidence that Goudinel had ever anything to do with the compilation of this psalter throughout its various stages, but, on its completion in 1562, he harmonised the entire work, and published it in four-part harmony in 1565. For the most part he has given the melody to the tenor, but it is worthy of remark that in several instances he has assigned it to the superius.

Anyone interested in the question will find full details in the articles on Clement Marot in THE MUSICAL TIMES, June-November, 1881, where at page 555 will be found the "Old Hundredth" as harmonised by Goudimel, and at page 557 a table of the tunes in the Genevan Psalter of 1562, with the date of the first appearance of each. Particulars of the history of Goudimel and his harmonised psalters will be found at page 505.

PRECOCIOUS TALENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES,"

SIR,-Will you permit me space to express my entire agreement with the excellent article on the above subject in your March number?

I have always strongly condemned the performance of ratorios by children, which is becoming dangerously fashionable in various parts of the country. I am glad, therefore, to see your protest against the "musical and dramatic overpressure" involved in the performance of opera by children at the Savoy Theatre.

The two things are quite on a par, although, as far as the number of executants is concerned, infinitely more mischief is likely to be done by oratorio than by opera, because the former is possible in almost every little town, while the latter can, for obvious reasons, only be attempted in isolated cases.

A treatise on "The Child's Voice" by Mr. Lennox Browne and myself, in which the subject has been discussed at some length, is nearly through the press; but we hope nevertheless to be able to insert a reference to your article which is pregnant with sound advice, and which ought to be read by every one interested in the musical education of children.

> I am, Sir, your obedient Servant, EMIL BEHNKE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I read with great pleasure your notice of the report of the Birmingham Musical Association, in your last issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and can bear testimony to the great love of good music among the working classes. But I should like to point out to you what I consider a great danger to art in these cheap performances.

When these Concerts were first started they were attended almost entirely by the working class, for whose benefit they were intended; but I have been informed by professional gentlemen and amateurs in Birmingham, in a position to know, that they are gradually losing their character of working class Concerts, and are being largely attended by people who could afford their three or four shillings to hear the works properly rendered by the Festival Society, with a professional band, instead of an orchestra very largely composed of amateurs.

One of the most promising of the Birmingham Choral Societies has this season had to discontinue its Subscription Concerts, mainly owing to the inadequate support given by the Birmingham public.

Now, anyone having had the least experience in Choral Societies, will at once realise the difficulty in a pecuniary point of view without being undersold.

There are numbers of people in Birmingham, as elsewhere, who are fond of music, but are not sufficiently cultivated to be able to judge of the artistic merits of a performance of our great oratorios; and who for the sake of saving a few shillings would transfer their patronage elsewhere. It would be a great pity if in so important a musical centre as Birmingham anything were to tend to lower the artistic standard of excellence for which the town is so justly celebrated .- Yours sincerely,

ORCHESTRA.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

*, Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date on onlice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscribtion is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ABEROAVENY.—An interesting Eisteddfod was held on Easter Monday, Mr. J. A. Rolle, M.P., acting as President, and Mr. Brinley Richards as one of the adjudicators. Prizes were given for the best playing of a pianoforte solo, the performers not to exceed sixteen years of age, the best singing of a base song, also a tenor song, and for choir singing. The prize of £20 and gold medal to Conductor, was awarded to the Victoria (Ebbw Vale) Conductor, Mr. G. Howells. Prize of £40 and silver medal to Conductor, was gained by the Ebbw Vale, Wyley's Choir (Tredegar), for the singing of a Madrigal. The great competition of the day was for a prize of £4,000, with gold medal to the Conductor, for the best performance, by a choir of not less than 150 nr over 300 voices, of the chorus "Hark! the deep tremendous voice" (Haydn). Three choirs competed, Mr. Richards complimented all, and with the concurrence of Mr. E. Evans, Mr. Caird, and Mr. T. Briggs, awarded the prize to the Dowlais Harmonic Society, numbering 170 voices, conducted by Mr. Dan. Davies. Mr. D. Brown accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. E. R. Davies on the harmonium Acron.—Mr. S. Eagall gave his first annual Concert. on the 18th on the pianoforte, and Mr. E. R. Davies on the harmonium.

Acron.—Mr. S. Eagall gave his first annual Concert, on the 13th ult, at the Priory Central Hall, the programme consisting entirely of classical and high-class modern music. Mr. Eagall (who is a papil of Mr. Walter Bache) was much applauded for his performance of Mr. Walter Bache) was much applauded for his performance of Schumants. "Papillons," Op. 2. The Concert-giver was associated with Mr. C. H. Allen Gill in Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat, for pianoforte and cello, the performance of which reflected great credit on both artists. Mons. L. Szczepanowski performed Ernst's "Elegie," and Moszkowski's Bolero for violin solo, the latter especially eliciting warm applause. The vocalists were Misses Annie Williams, and Marian Price, and Mr. W. E. Smithett, who were well received in songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Raff, Gluck, &c. The Concert was concluded by a performance of Raff's Tarantella, for four hands, in which Mr. Eagall was associated with Mr. W. J. Mawby, who also accompanied throughout the evening.

ALFORD.—The members of the Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Cowen's Rose Maiden, in the Corn Exchange, on the 10th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Vinnie Beaumont, Miss Eliza Thomas, and Mr. E. Gregory. The performance was very successful, Homas, and Mr. E. . tregory. In the performance was very succession. Bell-rast.—Mr. and Mrs. Kempton, assisted by their pupils, gave a Musical Re-union in the Assembly Hall, on Tuesday evening, the List ult. The vocal items respectively given by Miss Keys, the Misses King, Messrs. Kenneth Stewart, Albert, Browne, and Mrs. Elroy were most acceptable. Miss Kate Wilkinson (aged six, Miss Richards, Miss Gulbrausen, and Miss Mendham Kempton in their performances upon the pianoforte were all excellent, and Mrs. Kempton was deservedly awarded great applause for her fine playing of Thalberg's three line arrangement of Rossinit's "Mi mancal a voce." The partsongs "Ever True" (Hatton), and "Good Night" (Carulli), were well sung. Mr. Kempton was, as usual, conductor and accompanist. sung. Mr. Kempton was, as usual, conductor and accompanist.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—A performance of Liszt's 13th Paalm, a representative work of the so-called advanced school, was given by the Auckland Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Kilburn, on Tuesday, the 14th ult, with full band and chorus. The tenor solo was admirably sung by Mr. Howard Welch, of Durham Cathedral. Miss Annie Marriott was the soprano soloist, and both in her songs and in the solo part of Mendelsonh 's Loreity obtained well merited applicate. BLACKBURN.—A very enjoyable Concert was given on Monday evening, the 13th ult., by the St. Cecilia Society, with an orchestra selected from Mr. Chas. Haile's band, under the leadership of Mr.

Henry Nuttail of Berry. The programme consisted of the first part of Sir M. Gosta's Oratorio Naaman, the solos in which were taken by Miss Norton, Miss Shorrock, Mr. Seymour Jackson, and Mr. J. Higginson, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit. The choral was were very effective to the choral "When famile the choral "When famile the choral "When famile the choral "With sheathed swords." The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. This Concert may be said to have been the most successful yet given by the Society, and reflected the greatest credit upon Mr. James H. Rooks, under whose efficient and rainstaking conductorship the Society has made great progress during the last four seasons.—The Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson, brought the tenth season to a close with a Concert. painstaking conductorship the Society has made great progress during the last four seasons.—The Vocal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Robinson, brought the tenth season to a close with a Concert on Thursday evening, the 16th ult. Hero and Leander (C. H. Lloyd) and The Feast of Adonis (A. Jensen) were the principal works given Miss Wallington was highly successful in her rendering of the soprano solos in both works, and also in her songs. Mr. James Sauvage sang the bartione solos in Hero and Leander with good effect, and was much splitted in the tong: "Steady and ready" (Edbh), and the Tarantella" Cids la luna" (Rossain), the latter being encored.

BLYTH, NEAR NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The Messiah was sung by the members of the Philharmonic Society, on the 7th ult, before a large audience. The soloists were Misses Vinnie Beaumont (whose rendering of "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was received with much enthusiam and Louisa Bowmont, Messrs. G. H. Welsh, and J. Nutton.

Bridge of Allan.—The second Concert of this season was given by the Choral Society in the Free Church on the 17th ult. Mr. John Erekine conducted, and the accompaniments were most efficiently played by Miss Morrison at the piano, and Mr. J. J. Finlay, Organist of Linilithgow Aboy, at the harmonium. The programme was divided into three parts, the first including selections from Sonson, Science of Sonso

BRIGHTON.—The performance of Bach's Passion (St. Matthew) by the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society, on March 25, was in every respect highly successful. The soloists—Miss Annie Gill Smith, Miss Ellen Marchant, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. F. H. Horscroft—were thoroughly efficient, and the choruses were uniformly well sum, Mr. J. Spearing presided at the organ, and Mr. R. Taylor (to whom very much of the present excellent position of the Society is due) conducted. There was a good attendance.

BROCKLEY .- On Monday evening, the 20th ult., a Musical Lecture BROCKLEY.—On Monday evening, the 20th ul., a Musical Lecture entitled "A struggle for civil and religious liberty." as recorded in Handel's Oratorio, Judas Maccabeus, was given in the Presbyterian Church, by Mr. W. Cowper Pellatt, interspersed with illustrations from the oratorio by the Woolwich Arsenal Philharmonic Society's band and chorus. The soloists were Madame Riechelmann, Mr. H. Cockell, and Mr. H. H. Wilson; Conductor, Mr. Pellatt; American organ, Miss Edwards. The performance was very satisfactory, the solos, "From mighty kings" and "Sound an alarm," being especially

BROUGHTY-FERRY.—It may fairly be questioned whether there exists an Oratorio of greater vocal difficulty than Mackenzie's Ross of Sharon. There are many more ponderous works, but none more exists an Oratorio of greater vocal difficulty than Mackenzie's Ross of Sharon. There are many more ponderous works, but none more beautiful, more highly elaborated, or more strikingly original in thought and mode of expression; but it is also, or-perhaps therefore, a most trying work for the vocalists—solo and chorus. Without staying to prove this position, it may be noticed that even London found it necessary some short time ago to make very special preparation to ensure for it a satisfactory performance. The greater credit is therefore due to the members of the Choral Union for their enterprise in adopting the work, and for the ability with which it was performed on the 7th ult., before a large audience, indeed the entire performance can only be spoken of in the highest terms. The chorus singing was clean and bright, and the reception of all the important choruses with which the work abounds was most enthusiastic, that commencing "Make a joylul noise" being encored. Mrs. Haden is to be congratulated on the control of the control Mr. M'Donald. The fact that the baritone music was entrusted to Mr. Joha Bridson, is sufficient guarantee for the excellence of its performance. His rendering was really magnificent. A small but remarkably efficient orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, did full justice to the wonderfully beautiful instrumentation. Mr. Neale conducted with

Mr. H. Cross, the contralto part being taken by Miss M. Gould, a local amateur. The band and chorus numbered about 132. Mr. T. B.

CANTERBURY.—An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Hymn. of Praise was given at the special service in the Cathedral on Easter Tuesday. The orchestra was chiefly composed of old choristers, assisted by some of the leading players of the town. The solos were exceedingly well sung by Masters Elmes, Davison, Fricker, and Hudson, the Rev. G. H. Gray (minor canon), and Mr. Grundy. The choral parts were also effectively rendered. Mr. B. Fricker presided at the organ, and Dr. Longhurst conducted.

The the organ, and Dr. Longnurst conducted.

CHEPSTOW.—On Wednesday, the 15th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave a most successful Concert, consisting of selections from the chief works of the great masters. The artists were Miss Gane, Miss H. M. Jones, R.A.M., Mr. Morgan (of Bristol Cathedral), and Mr. J. Bridson. Mr. A. E. Kingsford conducted. The accompanients were played by Misses Watkins and Thomas, and Mr. the vice-president of Salvardy following, Mr. Kingsford received from the vice-president of Salvardy following, Mr. Kingsford received from the vice-president of Salvardy following, Mr. Kingsford received from $64, 17s. as a mark of respect from the parishioners and Choral Society.

Corman, Surrery—On Thursday evening, the give hult, Mr. F. J.

Karn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, gave his second annual Concert before a large audience. An important feature in the programme was the trombone playing of Mr.

Samuel Millar, his solos, including a Fantasia on Rossini's Moses tin

Egypt, eliciting warm applause. The pianoforte part was played by

Mr. Karn. The vocalists were Miss Florence Thompson, Miss Ellen

were successfully given by Miss Bessie Poole, and Mr. Karn's piano forte pieces were well received. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Walter Stark and Mr. Karn. Mr. Walter Stark and Mr. Karn.

COLNEROUK, NEAR WINDSOR.—The members of the Colnbrook Public Room Choral Society held their annual Soirée with much success, on Wednesday the Sih ult. During an interval in the pro-gramme, Mr. Richard Ratcliffe was re-appointed Conductor, Mr. William Richards Secretary, and Mr. Mindenhall Treasurer.

CROYDON.-Mr. George Webbe's Instrumental Septet Union an admirable Concert, at the Public Hall, on the 16th ult., and i addition to the instrumental selection, songs were contributed by Mis N. Hicks, Miss Ashford and Mr. Pook; solo piano, Miss Lamble, who, with Miss Head, also accompanied the choruses and partsongs; harmonium, Mr. E. A. Macey. The Cantata was very well rendered and much appreciated. Miss Hicks's singing was specially noticeable. Such a high-class and successful Concert has not been given in the town for many years, and the Conductor, Mr. A. G. Macey, is to be congratulated on the satisfactory termination of the season's work. work.

WORK.

DEAL.—An excellent Concert was given in St. George's Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 14th ult., by the members of the Deal and Walmer Choral Society. The first part of the programme was devoted to Gade's Crusaders, the second part was miscellaneous, including a Choral March (Longhurst) and a violin and pianoforte duet, well played by Mr. C. M. Gann and Mrs. Massey; the third part comprising C. H. Lloyd's Cantata Hero and Leander. The solo vocalists were Miss Ellis Walton, Mrs. Hugh Massey, Mr. J. Probert and Mr. T. Kempton. Leader of the orchestra, Mr. Gann; Conductor, Dr. Longhurst. Both the Cantatas were well rendered.

DORKINO.—Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was performed on the eth ult, with band and chorus, the solo singers being Madame A. Paget, Miss Kate McKrill, and Mr. Edward Hall. The band was ably led Mr. C. Daws. The Concert, which was a great success, was under the management of Mr. P. Daws. Mr. E. Withers, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

Mr. J. C. Clarke conducted with ability.

Wellington.—The Concret annually given by Mr. Toms took place at the New Town Hall on the 7th ult. The vocalists were Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Leonors Pople, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Frank May; violin, Mr. A. C. Tonking; violoncello, Mr. J. E., Hambleton; pianoforte, Mr. E. J. K. Toms; harmonium, Mr. Toms. A well selected programme was efficiently rendered, and the artists fully maintained their high reputation.

Welshpool.—The Harmonic Society gave its annual Concert on Wednesday, the 8th ult., under distinguished patronage. Barnby's Releksiah was the work performed, with Miss Bertha Moore, Mr. Myatt (Chester Cathedral), and Mr. H. J. Dyke (Worcester Cathedral), as soloists. Miss Moore gave a highly artistic rendering of the soprano music, as did also the other artists in their respective parts. The Choir was ably conducted by Mr. Alfred Knight. The miscellaneous part consisted of songs and part-songs, and Miss Clara Smith contributed a violin solo, "Scene de Ballet" (De Beriot), in a very successful manner. Mr. T. M. Price, R.A.M., and Mr. W. H. Jones were efficient accommanists. were efficient accompanists.

WhitTRN,—On Tuesday, the 22nd ult., the Choral Society gave a capital rendering of Handel's Creation. The choir sang with great vigeur and precision, and evoked much applause from a large and attentive audience. Mr. Kilburn, of Bishop Auckland, and Mr. Storer, of Scarbro', played the Novello accompaniments for harmonium and pianoforte with conspicuous skill and effect. Mr. Hallgate again conducted a performance free from any perceptible flaw or hitch. The soprano solos were effectively sung by Miss Vianie Beaumont, and the tenor and basa airs were artistically given by Mr. G. H. Welch and Mr. John Nutton respectively.

MIT. John Nutton respectively.

WINCANTON.—On Wednesday, the 2znd ult., two highly successful Concerts were given by the Choral Society in the Town Hall. The principal work performed was Hiller's Song of Victory, in which Miss Marie Gane rendered the solos with marked effect, and the choir were heard to advantage. The second part comprised a selection of songs and instrumental pieces, the vocalists being Miss Marie Gane, Miss Kilgour and Miss Stuckey Wood, the first-namel lady accurate enthusiastic encores for her songs. Among the instrumentalists were Mrs. Kilgot planofortel, Miss Hill (harmonlum), Mr. Wentworth Bennett (Bute), Mr. Slove (volin). Mr. G. E. Lyle, Organist of Sherborne Abley, conducted.

Worksor.—A successful Concert was given in the Town Hall, on the 11th ult, in aid of the Grichet Club, which was largely attended. The principal vocalist was Mr. Bingley Shaw (whose songs were much appreciated), and several amateur singers gave their services on the occasion. Mrs. Birks accompanied on the pianofort.

occasion. Mrs. Birks accompanied on the pianoforte.

Wyre (Near Pershore).—On the 8th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave their fourth Concert in the Schoolroom, which was well filled by a most appreciative audience. The programme consisted of the Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers, and a miscellaneous selection of sacred music. The soloists in the oratorio were Miss E. Newby, Miss E. Pace, Rev. A. H. S. Pattrick, and Mr. Henry Brown, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choruses were, on the whole, very well given, the gradations of tone being carefully marked. In the second part, in addition to the above named soloists, Miss Pace, Mr. F. M. Whitehall, and Mr. Hubert Clemens appeared. A new part-song, "Homeward at last" (Fritz Brandt), conducted by the composer, was sung for the first time. The Rev. F. C. Wilson conducted, and Messrs, W. A. Salisbury and C. H. Ogle officiated at the pianoforte and American organ respectively. pianoforte and American organ respectively.

YORK—An attractive Classical Concert was given in the Festival Concert Rooms, on the 9th ult., by Herr Padel, assisted by Herr Straus (violin), Herr O. Bernhardt (viola), and the Rev. Canon Hudson (violoncello); vocalists, Miss K. Winifred Payne (R.A.M.) and Miss Straus (violin), Herr O. Bernhardt (viola), and the Rev. Canon Hudson (violoncello); vocalists, Miss K. Winifred Payne (R.A.M.) and Miss Sedgewick (pupil of Herr Padel), Miss Hammond, also a pupil of Herr Padel, played with her master a pianoforte duet by Moezkowski. The programme was excellently rendered, and Miss Payne, who sang like a true artist, was thoroughly appreciated.——A military pageant of a character never before seen in York on a Sunday was witnessed on the 10th ult., when the troops of the garrison, together with the York Wolmeters of both arms, attended Divine service in York Minster, and about a fortnight ago the description of the Gordon the Minster, and about a fortnight ago the description of the officers commanding the local military and recedestachments. Arrangements were then carried out for a parade for Divine service, and collections were made in the morning and evening on behalf of the Egyptian War Fund, and in the afternoon on behalf of the Egyptian War Fund, and in the afternoon on behalf of the Egyptian War Fund, and in the afternoon on behalf of the Bordon Memorial Fund. Service commenced at half-past ten o'clock, and the arrival of the respective detachments was so timed that the soldiers might take their places in the nave prior to that period. The processional hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," was sung to the beautiful tune of St. Gertrude, by Arthur Sullivan. As the choristers, songmen, and clergy proceeded from the south choir aisle to their seats in the nave, they sang the first verse without orchestral accompaniment; but at the commencement of the second triumph, "He accompaniment was played by the band selected by the Dean of York principally from "A Section of Charles, George Gordon," by the Rev. Reginald Barnes, Vicar of Heavitree, near Exeter. Dr. Naylor had scored the music for a complete military band and choir. It is a work of considerable musical excellence, and was effectively rendered. The bass solo, "Jehosaphat said," was well sumy by Mr. McCalt; the tenor solo, "Jehosaphat said," was given some content of the second of the double quartet, "Thou therefore endure," was rendered and the double quartet, "Thou therefore endure," was rendered and the souble quartet, "Thou therefore endure," was rendered and the second charlest of the second of t nave, was also attended by a vast congregation. The combined bands of the 3rd Hussars and the 28th Gloucester Regiment accompanied the choir in the rendering of the hymnsand the anthem. The processional hymn was "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and the concluding hymn "The Son of God goes forth to war." The anthem was "And Asa cried"; it was most impressively given. The composer, Dr. Naylor, conducted. During the offertory, the bands, conducted by Mr. Fricker, played a selection from Rossini's Stabat Mater. The lessons and Pealms of the service were very appropriate for the occasion. The congregations at the three services amounted to about 12,000 persons. 12,000 persons.

International Inventions Exhibition IN THE EAST CENTRAL ANNEXE.

RUMMENS' ORGAN PEDALS PIANOFORTES.

The application of Organ Pedals to Pianofortes has been found to furnish the most ready means of obtaining Pedal Practice in conjunction with manual work away from the Organ, but no method of Attachment hitherto employed has succeeded in obviating certain radical defects, until RUMMENS' ATTACHMENT was introduced. The attention of Organ Students and Organists is confidently called to this mode of Attachment which overcomes all the objections hitherto urged. Some of its advantages being—an organ-like touch, impact invariable (whether the pedalling be light or heavy), absolute immunity from any extra wear and tear to the Piano, and very easy of application to any kind of Piano (see testimonials).

> EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONIALS. DR. JOHN STAINER, M.A.

"I have carefully examined the Pedal-attachment to Pianofortes invented by Mr. H. J. Rummens, and I can confidently recommend it as being simple in construction, strong in details, and as offering an admirable pedal touch to the young student. For those who wish to study organ music in their own homes, I know of nothing more valuable than this Pedal-attachment."

DR. CHARLES STEGGALL, Professor of the Organ,

DR. CHARLES STEWMENT OF Music.

Royal Academy of Music.

"The touch, unlike that of the ordinary actions as applied to the Planofortes, differs but very slightly from that of the Organ; an advantage which, to the Organ student, must prove invaluable. I have recommended the province of the commended of the comme student, must prove invaluable. I have recommended these Pedals with great confidence, and they have in all cases given perfect satisfaction.'

DR. BRIDGE, Organist of Westminster Abbey, Professor of Harmony R. Coll. of Mus.

"A successful invention, and one which will give satisfaction to those who use it."

Dr. G. C. MARTIN, Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.
"The subject of touch has always been a great difficulty; by your arrangement, however, it seems perfectly impossible to overstrike the pedal note." DR. C. J. FROST, Professor of the Organ at the Guildhall

School of Music. "Every organ student who aspires to becoming a facile pedallist should have a set in the house."

MISS ALICE A. ROBINSON, Medalist, R.A.M.,

Organist of Argyle Square Church. "It has been of the very greatest assistance to me, and I can safely recommend it to any Student of the Organ who desires home practice."

The Pedals are of solid birch, and best London make, compass CCC to F (thirty notes). Full printed directions for attachment accompany each set.

A liberal discount allowed to the profession and trade. Cheques crossed Glyn, Mills and Co.

CHALLEN & SON'S Iron-Frame Pianos

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of

LONDON. 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877,—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS. 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

TESTIMONIALS.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O., English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Son. In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability under hard wear.

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. Challen & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if not unequalled.

THE "BELL" ORGANS.

THE high standard of excellence maintained throughout all Organs manufactured by us, from the largest to the smallest, has created a world-wide demand for our Goods.

We will ask dealers not to compare our prices with those of any other Maker without taking into consideration the superior quality of our Organs; and if they do this they will find the BELL ORGAN not only the BEST IN QUALITY but the BEST VALUE IN THE MARKET.

Dealers save Wholesalers' profits in buying direct from us.

We make special Organs for export, and supply Catalogues in all languages, and as we always carry a stock of at least 400 Organs we can fill all orders immediately.

J.&J. HOPKINSON'S

may be seen and tested at Messrs. Hopkinson's Stand in the CENTRAL GALLERY, or at 95, NEW BOND STREET.

The distinctive feature of this Pedal Attachment is that of a "spring," which, on being compressed by the depression of the Pedal, releases a "retaining catch" acting on a lever under the keys, allowing the spring to impart a crisp and uniform note to the Piano, whether the pedalling be legato or otherwise. It is thus evident that the advantages obtained by this (the "Remontoir") principle are of the greatest possible importance, and also that perfect immunity from damage to the instrument is secured, and a pedal touch equal to that of the Organ ensured.

This is the ONLY ACTION in which the above important requirements are combined, and it is therefore SUPERIOR to ALL OTHERS.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER and CO. have the honour to announce that during the ensuing season (1885-86) they propose to give at .ST. JAMES'S HALL, a series of Concerts under the above title.

These performances will be, to some extent, a revival of the "ORATORIO CONCERTS" given by Messrs. Novello from 1869 to 1875. In resuming their task it will be the aim of the Directors to secure the utmost possible perfection of detail, the demand for which has so materially advanced during the last few years,

The following works will, amongst others, be included in

MORS ET VITA
REDEMPTION

THE SPECTRE'S BRIDE

MACKENZIE'S

J. S. SHEDLOCK, Esq.

THE UNITED RICHARD WAGNER SOCIETY was founded in 1883—the year of the Master's death—with a view of combining his scattered adherents in one organisation for view of combining his scattered adherents in one organisation for effective action. It was then decided that no more practical means could be devised of carrying on his art-work, and of perpetuating the principles to which his life was devoted, than by ensuring the periodical representation of his masterpieces under conditions identical with those which he himself had inaugurated in 1876.

To this end a reserve fund has been established by this Society, the maintenance of which is dependent upon the subscriptions and donations of members and others interested in the cause.

Bayreuth has been selected for the continuance of these performances, not only in deference to the Master's wishes, but also because the traditions and associations of the place, as well as the theatre which he built there, offer unique advantages for the complete realisation of his musical and dramatic conceptions.

The Society has already 181 branches and agencies in Europe and America, with a total of 5,124 members.

It is believed that in England there must be a large number of admirers willing to assist in this important work; and it is also hoped that the London Branch may serve as a rallying point for the followers of Richard Wagner resident in this country. With this object in view, the Committee organises Lectures, Readings, Conversaziones, &c., to which the members of the London Branch are invited without payment.

The following are the arrangements for the season:-

May 29 CONVERSAZIONE.

June 5 "PARSIFAL." Lecture, with musical illustrations, by Charles Dowdeswell, Esq.

June 12 ... "RICHARD WAGNER AS A MORALIST." Conference by Ferdinand Praeger, Esq.

June 23 ... " TRISTAN UND ISOLDE." Lecture by H. F. Frost, Esq.

July 17 DRAMATIC READING by Miss Alma

The Annual Subscription of Members is 10s., payable on the 1st of January of each year. Members are entitled to vote, through their representatives, at the General Meetings of the United Richard Wagner Society, and, personally, at those of the London Branch. The "Bayreuther Blätter," the organ of the Society, is issued to them at the reduced charge of 6s. per annum, and special facilities for attending prospective performances at Bayreuth will be offered to them should the funds of the Society permit.

Applications for membership to be addressed to the Honorary Secretaries, B. L. Mosely, Esq., 55, Tavistock Square, W.C., or Charles Dowdeswell, Esq., Brantwood, Macaulay Road, Clapham Common, S.W., who will also thankfully receive donations towards the funder of the Society.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MUSIC AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

IT is not too much to say that a flutter of pleasurable expectation passed through musical circles at the first intimation that music would form one of the divisions of the third in the series of exhibitions at Kensington, which commenced with the Fisheries, and was continued last year with the still more successful show, familiarly called the "Healtheries." It was felt that although the exhibition was to be one of "Inventions"—the only difference between the musical and the general exhibits being that the former could be represented by inventions since 1800, while the latter were to go no further back than 1862—yet that the occasion could not possibly be allowed to pass without some official recognition of music as an art. Of course, in every International Exhibition from 1851 until the present time, music has played a more or less prominent part, but now it was to figure as an integral portion of the scheme. Here was an opportunity for furthering the cause of musical progress in this country, which the South Kensington authorities would utilise in a manner befitting their lofty position, having regard to the fact that the dissemination of knowledge, and not mere pecuniary profit, has always been looked upon as the object of their existence. At any rate, it was confidently anticipated that whatever was done, little or much, would show a high purpose, without the slightest concession to that vulgarity of taste which is supposed to reign supreme among the masses of the public. How far these reasonable expectations are likely to be realised we shall presently proceed to consider.

It may fairly be said that the exhibition itself affords no ground for disappointment. Musical inventions, by which may be understood musical instruments of every class, are well represented, and, in fact, the original space allotted has been considerably exceeded. Down the central gallery, from end to end, is an imposing array of pianofortes, from the concert grand to the boudoir or school pianette. We miss the names of a few of the most eminent English and foreign manufacturers, but, on the whole, the show is fairly representative of a branch of industry mainly the growth of the present century. It would be out of the question to attempt anything like a complete description of the display, while to single out a few makers for mention would be an injustice to the remainder. Those who are interested in the subject will, doubtless, go and judge for themselves of the comparative merits of English, American, French, and German made pianofortes.

There is also a goodly show of reed organs, but consideration of space, of course, imposed some limitation on the number of pipe organs. However, the king of instruments is represented at the east end of the gallery by a large three-decker by Willis, and at the west end by one of scarcely smaller dimensions by Walker, while at the corners of the gallery are other instruments large enough for ordinary churches or concert-rooms, by Brindley and Foster, Wedlake, Jones, and Bishop. Almost every orchestral instrument is to be seen, and barrel instruments, from the orchestrion to the musical album, have more than their fair share of space. Naturally, the various exhibitors are not content with the mere display of their goods. Instruments are made to be heard not looked at, and consequently a series of recitals is given daily, the organs being played in turn, while the pianos are wheeled into a Concert-room holding 400 people, which the Executive Council has thoughtfully provided for performances. The programmes of these recitals are doubtless arranged between the artists and the manufacturers, and if they are found to be generally indifferent in quality the central authorities cannot in justice be called upon to bear the blame. For this reason these performances should not be included in any criticism on the general musical arrangements of the exhibition. We will only remark before passing on that visitors are likely to hear some curious things, if we may judge from observations already made. There is no reason to suppose, for example, that the programmes on Saturday the 23rd ult., differed from those of other days in quality. this occasion pianoforte recitals were given by Signor Tito Mattei and Mr. Ernst Wertheim, and consisted of operatic selections, transcriptions, and "brilliant" pieces by the respective players. But the oddest feature in the day's arrangements was an organ recital by Mr. J. Jeffereys which did not include a single piece of genuine organ music. Among the items were the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Mid-summer Night's Dream" music, Gounod's Saltarello, and a chorus "Tarantara" from the "Pirates of Penzance." It may have been the object of the player to prove that the capacity of the organ is limited. If so, he succeeded admirably, for the effect of the pieces named was supremely ridiculous.

More interesting to high-class amateurs than the manufacturers' exhibits will be the Historic Loan Collection in the galleries of the Albert Hall, which is to be opened in a few days. This is to consist of musical instruments, manuscripts, and printed books, pictures, &c. There was a similar display in the Exhibition of 1872, but the present is more comprehensive, and the intention of the Council to illustrate the history of music from the earliest times seems likely to be realised, collectors having been generous in lending their treasures for the purpose. The net value of the collection is incalculable, that of the violins alone being enormous. One can imagine what the effect would be were all the magni-One can ficent Strads, Amatis, &c., placed in the hands of skilled performers for the interpretation, say, of a Beethoven Symphony. Antiquarian musicians will be delighted with the splendid display of harpsichords, spinets, clavichords, ancient harps, bowed and wind instruments. A picturesque feature of the exhibition is a series of three completely furnished music rooms arranged by Mr. George Donaldson, one illustrating the Elizabethan period being especially rich in material. Among innumerable curiosities are the oldest English piano known to exist, by Zumpe, 1766, and the lavishly decorated grands manufactured by Broad-wood for Mr. Alma Tadema and Mr. Burne Jones respectively. These latter instruments cannot be said to be historically interesting at present, but they may become so in course of time. It should be mentioned before quitting this part of the subject that arrangements are being made for a series of historic concerts, which, if properly carried out, cannot fail to be in the highest degree interesting and instructive. We will give the Council credit in advance for having in this one particular done everything that could be required of them.

It may further be conceded that a genuine desire to give prominence to the musical features of the exhibition led to the scheme of competitions between choral societies and brass bands respectively. Unhappily, efforts of this nature have never been successful in this country except at Eisteddfodau, and are never likely to be. We notice that some of have placed themselves hors concours, that is, they do not compete for prize medals. What possible benefit, indeed, would such world renowned firms as Broadwood and Son, or Collard and Collard, reap from a favourable report of a possibly unsatisfactory jury? Similarly our leading choral societies, each of which enjoys a high reputation in its own sphere of operations, would have nothing to gain, and everything to lose, by being placed in direct antagonism with each other, while the mere money value of the prizes, the highest of which is £100, is too paltry to be worthy of consideration. When the abortive National Music Meetings were started at the Crystal Palace, the most interesting episode was the appearance of a remarkably fine choir of Welsh miners. and it is quite possible that the South Kensington competitions' will result in some discoveries of a similar nature, as it is said that the entries are mainly from the provinces, and more particularly from the North of England. With regard to the brass band contests, nothing need be said in this place. We hear that it is quite likely they will not come off, and even if they do they cannot be of any real musical interest.

Apart from the competitions, which may prove amusing, but can scarcely yield any important results, what are the authorities doing for music as an art? Much, it may be said, for are there not many military band performances daily, not to mention organ recitals in the Albert Hall? With respect to the latter, it seems likely that the indignation which found vent last year in these columns will again bubble up. Many poor deluded students of the organ paid their money to obtain, as they thought, indirect instruction, and direct enjoyment from these recitals, and discovered too late that they had to listen to operatic pot pourris and other selections which in no sense could be regarded as organ music. Were the exhibition a commercial speculation and nothing more, we could understand the performers being told to play down to the taste of the mob. Similarly, musicians would then realise why Strauss's orchestra has been engaged at a cost of many thousand pounds to perform to the promenaders during the summer evenings. But we have always been told that South Kensington is an art centre; it was certainly intended to be so by the late Prince Consort, and apart from music much has been done in furtherance of the schemes for the higher education of the people which owe their initiation to his liberal views. Music, however, is considered worthy to serve no higher purpose than it fulfils at casinos and tea gardens. The Council might look with shame at the Crystal Palace where much, very much, is done for it, though the first business of the directors is to secure dividends for their shareholders. Let it be understood that we are urging no objections to the open air performances per se. These exhibitions have supplied a want long felt in London, and how much it is appreciated a sight of the crowds of promenaders is sufficient to testify. But we repeat with the utmost emphasis, the furtherance of art ought to be the primary consideration with the executive. This ought they to have done and not to have left the other undone. Why, even their predecessors did more than they are doing, and under circumstances of greater difficulty. In 1873, during the second of a series of annual exhibitions which collapsed for want of public support, a full orchestra was engaged to give daily classical Concerts in the Albert Hall. At the present time the question of cost does not enter into the matter at all, though even if it did we should still hold the same views. But, happily, there would be no possible risk of loss the leading pianoforte makers who are exhibiting were the experiment of 1873 repeated on even a more extended scale. The Inventions Exhibition is an assured financial success. The Kensington Council are the most fortunate of public caterers. With ample space and every facility at their command, and with all the kudos of royal patronage, they enter the lists against the managers of theatres, Concertrooms, and other places of popular resort at a very great advantage, which becomes unfair when it is unfairly used. We consider that ordinary speculators have a right to complain when they see titled rivals outbidding them for the favour of pleasure-seekers. In point of fact, the question may be placed in a nutshell. Either South Kensington is a centre for arteducation or it is not. If it is, the manner in which music is being treated at this exhibition is nothing short of disgraceful. If it is not, let the veil of pretence and hypocrisy which now hides its doings be ruthlessly torn away, and the truth made manifest to all whom it may concern.

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett. IV.—MUSICAL CRITICISM

It will not be at variance with the subject of this paper if I express regret that my observations on music in America-conceived, as I hope, in a judicial spirit and courteously stated-have excited a measure of ill-feeling in journalistic quarters beyond the Atlantic. Let me hasten to say that the spirit of annoyance is not universal. What, for instance, can be more creditable than the following remarks, extracted from Kunkel's Musical Review, a paper published in St. Louis:—"We do not wish to have our readers lose this opportunity to see American music through English eyes. True, it may be through English spectacles. Mr. Bennett may be mistaken in some respects, or, if he is not, we may think he is. Be that as it may, we can only gain by reading his views. When the entire series of articles has been published we shall take the liberty of briefly reviewing them; in the meantime, we trust our readers will give these articles the attention they deserve." In strong contrast with the perfect propriety of these remarks is the very different spirit animating some others, especially those coming from certain Teutonic sources. My opinion about the results likely to flow from the predominating advocacy and influence of modern German music appears to have given umbrage in quarters where, if adhesion was not likely, courteous argument might have been expected. Some of my transatlantic confrères actually lose their temper over the matter. One devotes a whole paragraph to denouncing my carelessness, because I was told in Denver that the organist of St. John's Cathedral bore the name of Damrosch, when my informant should have said Hall. By the way, I am glad to have this mistake corrected, in however rude a manner. Mr. Hall, whose organ playing I justly eulogised, and whose choir I compared to the best in England, is an Englishman, and Fellow of our College of Organists. The Precentor, Mr. Stevenson, is an Englishman also. From both facts let the musical Anglophobists of America get what consolation they may. I cannot resist adding that one journal, the Musical Courier, in its resolve to be "nasty," actually described the non-existent organist, Damrosch, as a man of "little artistic account." Was ever a better illustration of "No case, abuse the plaintiff's attorney." Again, I am reproved for venturing to write about music in America after but three months' observation. I should accept the rebuke had I, in that time, attempted to master the condition of American principles on which the United States are governed. My task was very simple-viz., to hear music as often as possible, and decide upon the value of its performance. The gentlemen who, in New York and other cities, rush from listening to important works and scribble judgment before they have fully recovered breath, ought to know that it does not take a month to decide whether Mr. Thomas's orchestra plays well, or whether Mr. Tomlins, in Chicago, gives a good performance of the "Hymn of Praise." I am not egotist enough to suppose that the feeling shown by my American critics is limited in its origin and object to my humble self. It is a development from-to use no stronger term-a dislike of everything English. I make bold to distrust a good deal of the "gush" that pours forth at banquets, and on ceremonial occasions, concerning America's affection for the mother land. Three months' steady reading of the American press, from New England to California, and from Montana to New Mexico, at a time when difficulties were gathering in the path of England, clearly proved to my mind, not only a want of sympathy, but a tendency to rejoice, by anticipation, over the misfortunes, probable and possible, of the old country. American papers always write what will best please their readers, and on this question I found no difficulty whatever in coming to a conclu-Teutonic musical journalists across the Atlantic have a double reason for joining in the Attante have a doubt teasen for joining in manifestation. They fear that the land which chiefly supplies America with drama, and has flooded the States with "Patience," "Pinafore," and company, may, in the natural course of her and company, may, in the natural course of her the rising artistic fortunes, acquire predominance on the platform of serious music. Hence their cue is to run down English compositions and English taste with all the ferocity of alarm. They proclaim our country to be the Nazareth of musical nations, and ask contemptuously what good can come out of her. In this hue and cry the bark of the Musical Courier is conspicuous, though, perhaps, not worse than its bite would be had it any teeth. The other day the journal in question hazarded the following extraordinarily logical proposition: "The recent unsympathetic reception by the New York public and by the critics of a new English oratorio, which has been extravagantly lauded at home, is one more proof that New York is immeasurably in advance of London in musical culture." Having made this astounding deduction from the premises stated, the Courier felt encouraged to leave bad logic for the region where "facts" are manufactured to suit all customers. It said, referring to music in London, "The Richter concerts do not pay expenses, and Joachim plays before empty benches." The laughter of my English readers at the foregoing will not be less Homeric when they remember that this is the writer who discovered the little artistic worth of a fictitious organist. In the same article he so loses his temper as to "call names" at the St. James's Gazette; that paper happening to say-rightly or wrongly matters nothing here—that "Il Trovatore" (the Courier reprints it "Ill Trovatore") was performed in Berlin last season more often than any other opera. The New York sheet styles the assertion "an absurd lie" and "a monstrous falsehood," due to an endeavour of the London critics, "not content with the ignorance of their own public," to misrepresent the state of affairs in other countries. Poor Mr. Sutherland Edwardswho could have supposed that that amiable gentleman concealed under his benign exterior a purpose so scandalous and base!

attempted to master the condition of American critics, in their dislike and dread of England, fall society, or estimate the merits and defects of the foul of individual Englishmen, but this is not going to divert me from the task I have set myself, nor in the smallest degree to influence the manner of its

In order to understand thoroughly the musical criticism of the United States it is requisite to take a comprehensive view of the American press. This, however, is too vast an undertaking for the space at command, and I must forego whatever advantage it would secure. But one or two points cannot be passed over in silence. Journalism amongst our cousins lies under a supreme obligation to be swift Its courses must be served up to the and tastv. national table "hot and hot," with plenty of condiments to give jaded palates a perception of pungency. The public demand this, and the appetite grows by what it feeds upon. Hence the restless energy with which the transatlantic journalist seeks out facts, the daring way in which he works them up with the aid of a strong imagination, and the "sensational" style in which they are laid before the reader. The question is not in any great measure one of accuracy, still less of good taste. All departments of journalism feel more or less the influence of this condition of things, and assuredly that of art criticism does not appear to be exempt from its effects. I am, of course, speaking generally. There are notable and brilliant exceptions, worthy the country whose best magazine literature may challenge comparison with any in the world. Exceptions apart, the fact is as I have stated, and as a result we find in American papers musical criticisms over which one hardly knows whether to laugh or cry. Sometimes they are the work of the "funny man," who is turned on now and then to crack a few jokes for public delectation. There is no harm in the funny man. He understands his mission to make folks laugh, and does so with a considerable display of innocent personality, astonishing to punctilious Englishmen, but quite a matter of course with Americans, each one of whom, being a sovereign citizen, lives in the "fierce light that beats upon a throne." Occasionally, however, the funny man remembers, in the goodness of his heart, that his readers may want to know something about the music. At once he proceeds to immolate himself on the altar of duty, and display the most astounding ignorance for conscience sake. Not long ago the funny man of an important journal was sent to notice the doings at a Catholic Church, and fell into the lamentable error of descanting on the music. He told his readers that a certain Gregorian chant was "melodic, that is, sung by all the voices"; and that, in a "Passion" chorus, "the parts succeed one another in a cadence growing softer and softer, and almost dying away till the entire chorus swells in sweet but majestic burst." Again, he remarks of a melody that when its "two notes are sung slow, yet bold, full yet soft, with a melting modulation, they produce a feeling of sweet devotional melancholy, a mildened emotion that even the more artful and farfamed 'Miserere' cannot excite." I could supplement these examples by a crowd of others, gathered in the course of my American reading-gathered, not from provincial prints, but the leading papers of great cities, in which we should expect to find the funny man carefully checked, if not, in musical matters, firmly muzzled. Let me, however, be content with one supreme specimen. Referring to a symphony by Brahms, a New York weekly uttered the following: "The third movement is also simple in formation, consisting as it does of themes that appear in the following order: A, A, B, A; C; A, A, B, A; in which 'A' is a melody for violoncello that begins with three short waves or symmetrically formed arches succeeded by a longer

Yet it does not sound the very depths of the soul. On account of the expression of merely surface sorrow, venting itself in desponding plaints, this movement may be associated in idea with the slow movement of Mozart and Haydn." Reflecting upon this passage, and observing that a melody with three symmetrically formed arches followed by a wave cannot succeed in sounding the depths of the soul, I picture the funny man writing with his tongue in his cheek, and bent upon ascertaining how far balderdash would go down with the public. Let us now leave these musical notices pour rire for graver

There is plenty of serious musical criticism in America, and a fair proportion thereof may be described as both able and honest—honest in the sense that judgment is given without prejudice. The school of critics headed by John S. Dwight, in his active years, still exists, particularly in the veteran's own city, Boston, where, as might be expected, much sensible musical talk goes on. It is to be hoped that the list of critics of Anglo-Saxon blood and sympathies will lengthen in coming years. American music needs more men of John S. Dwight's stamp-men who have connaissance de cause, who can give sound reasons for the faith that is in them, and are not blown about by every wind of doctrine coming from heresiarchal quarters. Only by an increase in the number of such writers can the influence of Germans and men of German origin be counteracted. These have contrived to seat themselves in places of journalistic power, especially in New York, and there-though I question not their sincerity—they exemplify to the world the proverbial danger of a "little knowledge." I have already pointed to the Anglophobia that possesses them, but this, unhappily, does not mark the limit of their narrowness. They even deal in "flouts and jibes and sneers" at the great classical masters of their own nationality; having, it may be supposed, an idea that the hall-mark of a progressive spirit becoming to America is found in denunciation of everything not created to-day, or yesterday at the earliest. Music with them means the works of Wagner, Liszt, and their imitators, who, without the genius of the one and the cleverness of the other, act as though the art appealed only to nerve-centres, like the sharpening of a saw. Hence these critics can scarcely tolerate the "old masters." In presence of Handel they sigh with weariness; of Bach one of them declared, not long ago, that he was too simple (!). Following the cue given by Wagner they treat Mendelssohn with lofty contempt, while, as for French and Italian composers, they are, of course, completely out of the running. Even Beethoven does not escape! When in America I read, and, having well rubbed my eyes, read again, that the great master's violin Concerto is "uninteresting. It may be said that prejudice such as this defeats itself, as being like vice-

A monster of such hideous mien That to be hated needs but to be seen.

Unquestionably it does no harm with the intelligent minority-the cultured Americans who never fail to assure European visitors how much they bewail the short-comings of their newspaper press. But the vast majority of people in the United States, as elsewhere, are very much influenced by what they see in They accept the press as a teacher, and, for print. lack of wisdom to discern error, quietly believe what they are told. This is the misfortune of the matter. Tares, scattered by the hand of a child, readily take root, and spring up if the soil be

By way of illustrating much that has just been wave, and is most cheerless and desponding, said, I will refer to the performance and reception of

Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Oratorio the "Rose of feel ashamed that it should go forth to the world as Sharon," in New York. The rendering of that work an example of his country's musical criticism. took place after I left the country; concerning it and the attitude of the audience, therefore, I cannot speak, but the many printed criticisms now before me will serve my purpose, except that they leave me in some doubt as to public opinion. According to a few reports, the English verdict on the "Rose of Sharon" was endorsed by that of New York, a majority contending, on the other hand, that disappointment prevailed. In the latter case the wish may have been father to the thought; but, anyhow, so the matter stands. The majority of notices, moreover, display the ill-feeling towards English music, and the distrust of, if not contempt for, English taste, respecting which I have already spoken. Here comes in a strange consideration. It clearly enough appears that the praise bestowed upon the "Rose of Sharon" by English critics had excited expectation in American musical circles. Yet the New York Evening Post, in the plenitude of discernment, declared as follows, after the performance had taken place:--" The English have been dubbed an unmusical nation so often that they have become sensitive on this point, and endeavour to hide their nervousness by whistling—i.e., by making a tre-mendous noise on the slightest provocation. This accounts for much of the success in England of the Rose of Sharon,' a success which will not be witnessed in this country." If the Evening Post knew this why did it not protest against the impression made by the English welcome of Mr. Mackenzie's work? Why did it not say to the misled American public :- "Take no notice of the applause that comes over the Atlantic. It is only the noise of a lot of nervous people 'whistling aloud to keep their courage up,' and propagate a delusion?" The Evening Post very well knows why it kept silence, till, emboldened by the consensus of its German-American associates, it thought there lay no danger in jibing at a nation which flourished in art, as Prince Bismarck has lately declared, when Germany was semi-barbarous. In this connection I will follow the Anglophobists—the upright and unprejudiced New York critics-a little farther. The Evening Post goes on to say:

"First-class operas or orchestral Concerts are seldom given there (in England) without a loss, whereas the most commonplace oratorio draws an audience of thousands. In Germany and France a hundred operatic performances are given to one of oratorio, and in this respect American taste fortunately goes with the Continent rather than with England. Religion is the mainspring of the English love of oratorio, for, if the music itself were admired, there is no reason why good operas and concerts should not be better patronised. Now Americans may be quite as religious as the English, but they do not care to confound art with devotion. Hence, in America, the oratorio is the most unpopular form of music-so unpopular, indeed, that sometimes it is deemed advisable to suppress the word oratorio in advertising the performance of a choral work. And in this aversion to oratorio the American people are guided by a correct instinct, for it is, at best, an illogical, unæsthetic, and hybrid form of art. There is some sort of a plot, a scenic background is imagined, the singers impersonate distinct characters; but there are no scenery, action, or costumes—nothing but evening dress and gloves." If I dealt in such ex-pressions as "absurd lie" and "monstrous falsehood" what an opportunity is here for getting rid of some of them. In point of fact, however, a tirade of monotony, exclaiming that "three hours of monotoan example of his country's musical criticism. Happily there is a set off. The New York Daily Tribune, while accusing English music of having long kept to a "rut," says: "The prospect of a musical emancipation in England, achieved through the influence of a British composer of originality and force, can only be a pleasant one to the kinspeople of the English on this side the Atlantic. It may even be that such an occurrence will precede a proper recognition of native American talent." We may doubt the value of what the writer means by a "musical emancipation," but here, at any rate, no spirit of unfriendliness shows itself. On its part, the New York Herald expresses an opinion, with seeming equanimity, that the "Rose of Sharon" "bids fair to become as popular here as it has become in England." Making due allowance for these and a few similar utterances, the general tone of the New York press was one of hostility to the work because of its British origin; this feeling, as it seems, being strong enough to outweigh the consideration that Mr. Mackenzie shows a leaning towards the modern methods which German-American critics advocate as the be-all and end-all of musical art.

The opinion of the New York press upon the claims of the new oratorio per se may now be examined, with the special advantage that my English readers know the subject perfectly well. They might naturally anticipate cordial approval of certain features in the work, especially those connected with the dramatic scenes, and they might, in view of the traditions of oratorio, expect to find indulgence shown to the few examples of set airs and choruses. us see how this turns out. The Times admits that "Mr. Mackenzie shows structural skill, talent and taste as a harmonist, a thorough knowledge of instrumentation, characterised by somewhat too great prudence in the use of instrumental effects, and the reverential spirit that lends dignity to the lyric illustration of a Scriptural text." But, according to the same writer, he lacks creative force and originality, and "his dramatic oratorio is pretentious, long-drawn, and dreary." After complaining about the "unbroken monotony" of the orchestration, all the spite of the critic comes out in a sneer. "It is possible that Mr. Mackenzie's new departure may have been inspired by what he considers the failure of Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn, to accomplish anything by the aid of their peculiar gifts. But it is far likelier that he stands in the position of the fox who deplored the worthlessness of the grapes in the old-time fable." The Mail contends that only Wagner could have done justice to the subject; that Mr. Mackenzie shows a lack of dramatic instinct, and, of all things, does not know how to handle leading themes effectively. "He has given these," observes the writer, "to several characters, but, instead of varying them in form and sentiment according to the phases of the drama, and thus giving them renewed charm and interest, they are merely repeated again and again, as if a leading motive were nothing more than a passport." I have quoted this remark in full, because it shows how superficial is the critic's knowledge of the oratorio, or how little capable he is of recognising a varied subject when he meets it. The Critic, which cannot see why a woman in trouble should comfort herself with the twenty-third Psalm, admits that Mr. Mackenzie's music "has moments of exquisite beauty," but points out many more instances of "impotent striving." Our friend, the Musical Courier, complains like the foregoing is its own condemnation, and nous rhythm, harmonisation and instrumentation every intelligent and right thinking American must become decidedly tedious." Yet the very work thus condemned is afterwards spoken of as "a thoroughly good and musicianly piece of composition." Trinculo came upon a "most delicate monster" in Prospero's Island, and it had two voices: "His forward voice now is to speak well of his friend; his backward voice is to utter foul speeches and to detract.' There is a monster, seemingly, in Manhattan Island. Which of its two voices are we to believe? Turning to the Daily Tribune I find that journal recommending itself for careful criticism in the subjoined passage:--" We confess, also, that we are unable to admire the conceit of presenting the first scene in Part three as a dream. Had the number been purely instrumental with the words as a motto, the incongruity would have been less apparent; but to hear the dialogue of the lovers, the march of the Watchmen and their rude words, and then to imagine that all that has taken place is the dream of the Sulamite is to ask one to set up a wall between his phantasy and his senses, which it is exceedingly difficult to maintain." Would the writer be surprised to hear that the "conceit" condemned by him has its origin in the author of the original poem?

"I sleep but my heart waketh. It is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, 'Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; for my head is filled with dew and my locks with the drops of night."

The critic is good enough warmly to praise the music of the Dream; but, in his judgment, Mr. Mackenzie has no staying power on an even plane of excellence: "In parts his writing is as modern as Liszt's, in parts it is as old-fashioned as Handel's." We are not told whether the drop is from Liszt to Handel, or from Handel to Liszt; but the association of these names with the "Rose of Sharon," even for purposes of comparison, belongs to the marvels of Enough of quotation. As for the mass of printed opinion, let an American writer (in Music and Drama) sum up:-"At the present moment, after one performance, the work of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie stands condemned in New York as a weakling-a poor melancholy conception that has neither spirit nor dramatic fire in it, that is tedious and common-

I need not point the moral of the foregoing to English readers, who will be unfeignedly sorry that their cousins across the water have no better musical guides, at the same time giving all credit for courage and independence to the few writers who, like Mr. G. H. Wilson of the Boston Evening Traveller, "A. L." of Music and Drama, and the editor of the Keynote, have shown, not only a spirit of justice, but power of discrimination. "A. L.," let me add in conclusion, lifts up his voice, Jeremiahwise, against the shortcomings of his confrères, and, after quoting some of their extraordinary utterances, remarks: "One cannot even laugh at such things; one can only mourn." He goes on: "Is it, then, impossible to gain a hearing in our day for a poetic musical work of such refined sentiment that it calls forth our tenderest feelings and our highest thoughts? Is it impossible to bring us down from heroic to gentle ideas? Is music alone to be free from the modern art-influence that tones down colour, moulds figures in softer outlines, and describes natural scenes in more delicate tracery than heretofore? Is music alone to be always loud when all other art demands the subdued tendency? And can the low tone not speak as earnestly as the clangy sound? Because a certain number of critics would not accommodate their minds to understand the peculiar tone of this composition, must the American public the voice of the enlightened section of American society, and in its growing power lies the hope of American emancipation, in musical matters, from the domination of mischievous principles, having as their chief results noise, bombast, and vulgarity.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. XVI.-SEBASTIAN BACH. READERS of THE MUSICAL TIMES do not need to be informed that the enterprise of Messrs. Novello and Co. - enterprise not unattended, it is to be feared, by some sacrifice—has given to the English public an edition of Spitta's "Life of Bach." The biography in question is one of those monumental works for which the world owes so much to the patient research of German authors. It takes in, and exhausts, not only the personal character and achievements of the master, but the men and the circumstances which seem to have had any influence upon his life. It says, indeed, all there is to say on the subject, and subsequent biographies of like scope, should any be superfluous enough to appear, must in effect present themselves as nothing more than reproductions. We should richly deserve "ridicule, if, in adding "Bach" to the series of our "Primers of Musical Biography," we made pretensions to independent research. Our duty is to go as far as possible in the opposite direction, and say that we are about to offer a sketch of the master's life, condensed from the materials found in Spitta's bulky volumes. In doing so, we hope that many readers may be so far interested as to pass from the mere outline, which is all we can attempt, to the finished portrait as drawn and painted by the exhaustive German writer.

John Sebastian Bach came of a race of musicians whose glory culminated in him, and then rapidly declined. Spitta traces the generations of his family for two hundred years, and as musician follows musician, we are reminded of the line of Scottish Kings which Macbeth feared would stretch on till "crack of doom." They had their seat in a secluded part of the Fatherland, and went through narrow lives with, no doubt, limited views of a world concerning which they knew next to nothing. The leafy solitudes of Thuringia, then almost a forest-land, must have influenced them, restricting their outlook, but deepening the resources of inward life. We know, at any rate, that they laboured in comparatively a humble sphere. They were organists, cantors, town musicians, and so on—making no great noise at a time when little beside cannon could be heard over distracted Germany, and employing their talents with an eye to a final reckoning with the Giver. Sebastian's father, Ambrosius, was one of twin sons born to Christophe Bach in 1645. Growing up, Ambrosius took almost, of course, to the family art. He and his brother, Johann Christophe, travelled for some time as "town-musicians' assistants," having, no doubt, somewhat vagabond experiences in that humble capacity. At length Ambrosius settled down in Erfurt (1667), there succeeding a cousin as town musician, and, a year later-the Bachs married early and (lawfully) often-taking to wife Elizabeth Lämmerhirt, the daughter of a furrier. Ambrosius stayed but a little while at Erfurt. In October of his marriage year he removed to Eisenach, leaving his place to another cousin. At Eisenach he remained till death, and there all but two of his children-six sons and two daughters-came into a world whence four of them soon departed. The therefore condemn it? I hope not." Here speaks survivors were Johann Christophe, second son;

Johann Jakob, fifth son; Maria Salome, first daughter; and Johann Sebastian, the Benjamin of the family and the most favoured of heaven.

Johann Sebastian was born on or about March 21, 1685, his baptismal register being dated March 23. Concerning what he was as a boy, not even Spitta can make history tell. All we know is that his childhood proved unfortunate. He lost his mother at the age of nine, and when Ambrosius Bach presented him, seven months later, with a stepmother in the person of Dame Barbara Bartholomäi, the family did not remain intact longer than eight weeks. Pallida Mors knocked at the door one day for the head of the house, and his place knew Ambrosius no more. This disaster scattered the survivors, Sebastian, then ten years old, passing into the charge of his brother Johann Christophe, who had been for some time organist of the principal church at Ohrdruf. Christophe married in 1694, although his application for an advance on his salary of forty-five gulden had met with refusal. Young Sebastian's new home could hardly have been luxurious, but it improved as time went on, his guardian's emoluments in 1690 being ninety-seven gülden, six measures and a half of corn, six cords of wood, and four loads of brushwood. Christophe does not appear to have been a very brilliant member of the family. But he taught his young brother what he knew, after a slow fashion by no means agreeable to Sebastian's quicker and more ardent nature. Here the first anecdote of the lad's life comes in.

Christophe had made a collection of the best organ music of the period, and kept it locked up in a bookcase as being meat altogether too strong for the immature digestion of Sebastian. The boy often cast longing eyes at the coveted volume, and wished with all his heart he could get at it. Temptation at last grew too strong for self-restraint. "He stole down at night and succeeded in extracting the roll of music through an opening in the wires. He had no light, and the moon had to serve him while he made a copy of the precious treasure. By the end of six months the work was finished—a work which none but the most ardent votary of his art could ever have undertaken. But his brother soon discovered him with the dearly-won copy, and was so hard-hearted as to take it away from him."

Sebastian received a lop-sided education at the Lyceum of Ohrdruf. That is to say, he was taught Theology, Latin, Greek, a smattering of rhetoric and arithmetic, and nothing else. There was a chorus of boy-singers connected with the school, and regarded as one of the musical institutions of the town, since its services were always available, for a consideration, at funerals, weddings, and in processions of various kinds. A good deal of money was earned in this way and distributed amongst the łads, in whose ranks Sebastian quickly took a leading place. So time went on till young Bach reached the age of fifteen. Then came a change. Christophe's family grew apace, after the fashion of all the clan, and as his salary did not increase in proportion, it became necessary for young Sebastian to make a start on his own account. What should he do? start on his own account. What should he do? The question was answered by Elias Herda, Cantor of the school, who successfully recommended him to the school of the Convent of St. Michael, Lüneburg, as a boy with a fine soprano voice, and great musical zeal. Spitta argues, reasonably enough, that something more must have been required than a good soprano voice, or a lad at the age of fifteen would scarcely have been accepted. Probably general musical attainments of a high character were insisted on. Sebastian quickly lost his treble, band, and there were some easy duties of an educabut this was a small matter. He could play the tional character. But all put together were not violin, clavichord, and organ, and so impressed his superiors, that they made him prefect of the choir. In this position he had free board at the convent, and a salary which varied according to the demand upon the services of the choir at funerals and festivities. In 1700, we are told, the choir earned 372 marks, of which Sebastian's share was fifty-six. This was not embarrassing wealth, but it served, especially as young Bach found more genuine riches in the large musical library of the convent, and in numerous opportunities of hearing important works. Meanwhile he studied hard. Spitta says: "The restless industry of genius-which is rather one of the forces of nature than an outcome of the prompting of our moral consciousness-irresistibly urged him forward, and gave him no rest, even at night, from the solution of the problems he set himself." At this time, also, he passed under the influence of Böhm, organist of St. John's Church in Lüneburg, and a musician singularly gifted. It is contended by the master's biographer that the force of Böhm's example can be traced in many of Bach's works. The argument has, undoubtedly, great interest, but lies outside our scope, and we must refer the curious to Spitta, who treats it with characteristic copious-

Sebastian remained three years in Lüneburg, during which time he extended somewhat the range of his general studies. On leaving, he did not follow the usual course and enter a university. The youth was poor, and when invited to join a court band at Weimar, he gladly accepted. This was not the Grand Ducal band, but one supported by the reigning luminary's brother, who, presumably, had a special love for music. In taking this appointment Sebastian went a little out of his way, which was that of the Church, but the experience did him no harm, He had made some acquaintance with French music during his residence at Lüneburg. At Weimar he was brought into contact with the music of Italy, then and there greatly favoured; and also gained the friendship of the celebrated organist, Effler. But the young man was not destined long to enjoy these advantages. Events were ripening elsewhere, which, in their fruition, took him away from Weimar, and placed him again in contact with sacred art.

The Municipality of Arnstadt had a large organ in one of their churches, and, though it was not a very good one, were sufficiently proud of it to be dissatisfied with their organist, Andreas Börner, who was not very good either. Arnstadt is not far from Weimar, and had close associations with the Bach family, so what more natural than that Sebastian should take an opportunity of going over and seeing the place? He went and touched the organ to such purpose that the Consistory made up its mind on the spot to get rid of Börner and put Bach in his stead. The post, as things went, was worth having, its salary of seventy-three thalers, eighteen groschen, being considered large. In return for all this wealth, the incumbent was expected to be industrious, faithful, and "an honourable servant and organist before God, the worshipful authorities, and his superiors." Consistory seems to have had no difficulty in making the change desired. Börner accepted a subordinate post on full salary, and young Sebastian gladly stepped into his place. There he was, so to speak, "in clover." He had little to do of a compulsory nature, attendance at church being limited to thrice a week, while the organ, compared with those he had previously known, was an ever-new delight. He was, perhaps, required to play the violin in the Count's exacting enough to prevent the full carrying on of Sebastian's self-education and the practice of composition. At this time of comparative leisure, Bach began writing concerted church music for performance by his own choir, taking as his model the older church cantatas. Sebastian was now about twenty years old, and Spitta says that, in organ playing, "no one could teach him anything much less compete with him." In other matters, however, the young musician found opportunities of gaining knowledge and experience. His course in art, theretofore, had been limited, and we might say here, that it never became, like Handel's, broad enough for the full development of his great faculties. There was a theatre at Arnstadt, sustained jointly by the Count and the burghers, but not possessing a regular professional company; whatever was done being the work of local amateurs. We may suppose Bach entered with the zeal of youth into an amusement so congenial, and somewhat distracted his mind from the incessant contemplation of graver artistic forms. That he had the will to turn now and again from church cantatas and abstract instrumental music appears from an interesting circumstance which marked his early time at Arnstadt. His brother, Johann Jakob, having closed his apprenticeship to music and wandered off into Poland, picking up a living as best he could, became smitten with a martial fever. He would be a soldier, and fight in the ranks of the Swedish King, then the adored hero of Protestantism. But before doing so he returned home, like an affectionate Bach as he was, to take leave of those whom he might never see again. His brother Sebastian thereupon wrote the well-known "Capriccio on the departure of a beloved brother"—a work which Spitta describes as "unique in the whole mass of Bach's compositions." It is not, however, the earliest example of what we now call "programme music," Kuhnau's remarkable sonatas on Biblical subjects having preceded it, and indeed formed Bach's model. Many such things were written at the period under notice, and signalised a premature application of imagination to music—premature, because the resources of the art were not then adequate as means of expression. Kuhnau seems to have been a bit of a wag in his way, and sometimes it is hard of a wag in his way, and sometimes it is nature to tell whether he is joking or in earnest. The scheme of one of his Biblical sonatas may here be set forth, to show the parallelism between it and Bach's piece. In "Saul cured by David by means of music," we have three movements respectively entitled, "Saul's melancholy and madness," "David's refreshing harp-playing," "The Kine's mind restored to neace." Bach's work King's mind restored to peace." Bach's work has five movements, thus superscribed: I. "Persuasion addressed to friends that they withhold him (the brother) from his journey"; II. "Representation of the various casualties which may happen to him in a foreign country"; III. "A general lamentahim in a foreign country; III. A general lamenta-tion by friends"; IV. "The friends, seeing it cannot be otherwise, come to take leave"; V. "Aria di Postiglione" (one is reminded here of Handel's "Allegro Postillions," in "Belshazzar"). It appears from this that Bach ventured as far from the region within which musical language is intelligible as do our modern composers when they attempt to reveal an "inner consciousness." Into the musical characteristics of this "unique" work it does not become We may, however, advise readers us to enter. unacquainted with it to procure a copy, and note, with amused interest, the curious and truly German mixture of gravity and childlikeness. On the general question of "programme music," as thus presented, we cannot resist quoting the sensible remarks of Spitta:-

"The association of a musical composition with the conception of a definite scene, in order to arouse or to represent its emotional aspect, tends too often to mere platitude and weariness. It serves to stimulate the composer's inventiveness when the natural energy of his purely musical ideas is exhausted, and the theoretical composers of Bach's time who, following the example of the rhetoricians of antiquity, set themselves a suitable 'topic' or subject for invention-since free invention yielded them little or nothing-found in this process a means of inflaming their imagination by the images called up, a locus adjumentorum as it was called. imaginative powers of the hearer, however, far from finding a comprehension of the piece facilitated, is dragged away by secondary ideas from the main musical conception. The whole question, of course, turns on the nature of the ideas which it is the function of music to deal with. The French, whose genius for instrumental music is, on the whole, inconsiderable, were fond of adopting for their small clavier pieces-almost the only line in which they showed any creative talent-such titles as 'L'Auguste,' 'La Majesteuse,' 'Les Abeilles,' &c., thus stamping them as portraits or as genre pictures, and betraying their theatrical tendency. With regard to Kuhnau, a German, it has already been stated that he usually succeeded in expressing situations which were replete with emotion, although, indeed, he sometimes adopts very trivial means, as, for instance, when he assigns recitatives to the clavier; and in the succession of various tone-pictures, of which the dramatic requirements are too obviously beyond the conditions of musical art, he really fails as an artist. But when the poetic element is worked out and subordinated to a purely musical conception, so as merely to suggest the limitation to one single and definite scheme of feeling, within which the music can evolve its being, this no doubt serves to concentrate the sentiment but also to turn the balance between the objective and subjective elements in the work essentially in favour of the latter. For that which is universally paramount in a work of art is Form, in which, in a piece of music, the idea or the image is not included. All such artistic ideas are visions for the solitary soul, and in that aspect are not less justifiable than the lyric form in the poetic art, since Goethe declares that this should properly always be a poem on a given occasion, but to the multitude they are intelligible only in their narrowest development, and even then but rarely sympathetic. If the artist desire to give utterance to such a conception he must necessarily make use of the human voice, since in that nature has combined articulate speech with musical tone into a unit among the materials at his command."

This is a long extract, but we do not apologise to the reader. It springs naturally from the subject of Bach's "programme" piece, and its acute distinctions are valuable at a time when orchestral composers do not seem able to get along without the crutch of a story, and when the public are taught to hear nusic not for itself but for its artificial connections.

Another interesting composition of Bach's Arnstadt period is a Prelude and Fugue in C minor. Here the master's independent use of the pedals is shown at an early stage of development; the pedals having the subject at the close of the fugue only, and being then attended, not by counterpoint, but harmony. At the same time, also, he made progress towards the perfection which his treatment of organ chorals afterwards obtained. This was, indeed, a busy and a happy period in Bach's life. His youthful ardour remained unchecked by hostile circumstances, and pressed forward unto the prize of a high calling. At the end of two years came a change. Bach had lived upon himself at Arnstadt, and began to feel a necessity for further experience beyond the narrow field in which he moved. To this end he begged a four weeks' holiday from his superiors, and having got it and found a substitute, departed for Lubeck, where lived and flourished the famous Danish organist and composer, Buxtehude. Bach's stay in the northern town, and his happy association with Buxtehude, lasted four times four weeks. The young master seems, in this, to have acted quite regardless of his obligations at Arnstadt. Indeed, he might have remained at Lubeck altogether but for an accidental circumstance. It was the custom there, and elsewhere in Germany, to keep the organist's post "in the family" as far as that could be done by requiring each succeeding organist to marry a daughter of his predecessor. Buxtehude had a daughter, but she was too old for Bach, who, therefore, had to give up all hope of taking the place which his venerable contemporary could not much longer fill. On returning to Arnstadt, Sebastian found himself in trouble. The Consistory was not a hard master. On the contrary, it permitted Bach to do pretty much as he liked. Still, a holiday extended without leave from four weeks to sixteen could not be passed over without rebuke, and on January 21, 1706, Bach stood before his irate masters to offer such defence as he could. The interrogatories made and answers given are happily preserved in the records of the Sondershausen Principality; the document containing them being labelled "Joh. S. Bach, Organist of the New Church, summoned respecting his prolonged absence and the discontinuance of the part-singing." Query the first ran thus:—"The Organist of the New Church, Bach, is required to say where he has been for so long of late, and from whom he received leave of absence." Bach answered that "he had been to Lubeck to learn thoroughly one or two things connected with his art, and that he previously asked permission from the Herr Superintend." On this the Dominus Superintendens observed "that he had only asked such permission for four weeks, but had remained abroad quite four times as long as that.' Come, Master Bach, explain your French leave, if you can. Sebastian "hoped that the organ meantime would have been played by the substitute he had put in, in such a manner that no complaint could be made on that score." Well, the Consistory, good, easy body, would not further insist on the Organist's disregard of duty, but, since it had Bach in the dock, other high crimes and misdemeanours might as well be inquired into. " He had hitherto been in the habit of introducing surprising variationes into the chorals, and intermixing divers strange sounds, so that thereby the congregation were confounded.' Then he had held no rehearsals, "by reason of his not being able to agree with the scholars," andhere the Consistory pursed up its lips and looked as stern as good old German burghers could—"he is to declare whether he will play both part-music and chorals with the scholars, since another Capellmeister cannot be kept, and if he will not do this, let him say so categorically of his own accord, that a change may be made, and someone who will undertake it may be appointed to the post." Bach answered that "if a proper Director be appointed" he would meet the Consistory's wishes. On this the interview ended, the organist being told that he must explain his conduct fully within eight days. Sebastian did nothing of the kind, nor did his long-suffering superiors press him. Eight months passed without an understanding, and then by no means represented the 'uggab, the shepherd's the Consistory thought further action consistent with pipe, in use among the early Hebrews. Kitto, in his following: "It is hereby represented to the organist, Bach, that he should declare whether, as he has been enjoined to do, he will make music with the scholars or will not; as, if he feels no shame in keeping his post in the church and receiving the salary, he must also not be ashamed to make music with the scholars thereto appointed, for the time arranged elsewhere. It is intended that these should rehearse, so that for the future the music may be better looked after." Sebastian replied that he would give an answer in Very good, Master Bach, but there is another little matter on which the Consistory wants It "furthermore remonstrates with explanation. him on his having allowed the stranger maiden to show herself, and to make music in the choir." The stranger maiden! Ah, Master Bach, there had been previous talk of this young lady, and although you had informed the clergyman, Master Uthe, of her presence with you in the organ gallery, the matter requires looking into. She had not, of course, taken part in the service, and probably accompanied Bach to the Church only for private music. Yet the Consistory was scandalised. How Bach got out of it, and what reply he made on the question of rehearsals we do not know. But the "stranger maiden," who was she? Probably Sebastian's cousin, Maria Barbara Bach, whom he married next year, and who had come to live with an aunt in Arnstadt. They did some of their courtship in church, it seems, under the influence of music-not the first nor the last occasion in which Cupid has folded his wings in an organ gallery.

THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE IN RELATION TO MUSIC.

WHILE many persons will eagerly scan the Revised Version of the Bible to see whether the alterations are likely to have a favourable or an unfavourable bearing on scientific questions or religious beliefs, or on matters relating to ethnology or history, some musicians will examine the changes with regard to names of musical instruments and musical terms, to see whether any fresh light has been thrown upon the subject of ancient music in general, or that of Jewish music in particular. They must not expect to find extraordinary changes, for the revisers were bound "to introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorised Version consistently with faithfulness." With regard, therefore, to the names of Jewish instruments and terms relating to Jewish music, about which so much doubt and difficulty exist, it is evident that they could only venture on a new reading when convinced that the text was positively misleading; in some cases they possibly could have sug-gested an improvement, but were fettered by the principles laid down for their guidance. We propose to glance at some of the passages which have been altered, so as to give our readers a general idea of the changes which have been introduced, and shall add a word or two of comment on these variations, leaving to those specially interested in the matter the task of criticising them more minutely.

The first change occurs in Gen. iv. 21: here in the Authorised Version Jubal is spoken of as "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ." "Organ," taken from the Vulgate organum, has been changed to "pipe." It has long been known that the word "organ," associated as it is with the most ingenious and complex instrument of modern times, its dignity. In November, 1706, Bach received the Pictorial Bible, published nearly half-a-century ago, naïvely remarks that "the 'uggab certainly could not resemble the modern instrument of that name," but was probably "nearly identical with the pipe of Pan, in use among the early Greeks." In Job xxi. 12, and chapter xxx. 31, and again in Psalm cl., 'uggab, in the Revised Version, is properly rendered "pipe." With reference to the last passage mentioned, it may be noted that the Authorised Version has "organs," reminding us of Martin's Bible, where, in Gen. iv. 21, we find "les orgues." Now, 'uggab being merely a general term for wind instruments, we must say a word or two about the different kinds mentioned in the Old Testament.

There was the halil, a pipe of simple form. It is the word used in 1 Kings i. 40, "and the people piped upon pipes." We find it again in 1s. xxx. 29; and it is translated "pipe" in Authorised and Revised Versions.

Then there was the nekeb mentioned in Isaiah and Jeremiah and other places, and the nehiloth supposed by Jahn in his Biblical Archeology to be a pipe double in its structure. But authorities are not agreed about the meaning of the last named word. According to some it is merely a collective term for wind instruments, as neginoth was for stringed instruments. In the new version the mysterious word neginoth has been changed into "stringed instruments" in the heading of Psalms iv., vi., liv., lv. lxvii., lxxvi., but the heading nehiloth to Psalm v. is left, although the reading "wind instruments" is indicated in the margin. In Daniel iii. 5, the Chaldean instrument mashrokitha is supposed by good authorities to be of the 'uggab genus, and it seems strange that in the Revised Version the word "flute" (which, by the way, occurs in no other part of the Bible besides Daniel iii.) has been retained; "pipe," as suggested by Kitto and others, as printed in Wickliffe's Bible and in Sir Lancelot Brenton's translation of the Septuagent version of the Old Testament, would seem to be the more suitable word. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his commentary on the Old Testament, makes this curious remark about this passage in Daniel: "My old MS. Bible has trumpe and pipe and harpe." More could be said about the Revisers' translation of Daniel iii. 5; it does not seem altogether satisfactory.

Let us now turn to stringed instruments. The kinnor is the first one mentioned in the Bible. Jubal was the "father of such as handle the kinnor and 'uggab (Gen. iv. 21). It is translated "harp" in the old and in the new version, but most probably this instrument was a sort of lyre or lute, for in Ps. cxxxvii. we read of the captive Jews hanging their kinnors upon the willows by the rivers of Babylon. But so much is clear: kinnor is always rendered as harp. Now there was another stringed instrument called nebel, first mentioned in the Psalms. Most conflicting accounts are given of its size and of its shape, and to make matters worse, the word has been translated variously as "psaltery," "lute," and "viol," and even "musicke." The Prayer Book uses "lute." This nebel is supposed to have been a larger and more important instrument than the kinnor; in fact, the true harp of the Hebrews. Now with regard to the treatment of this word in the Revised Version, we notice that generally it is translated, and properly so, as "psaltery," but there are four passages-two in Isaiah, v. 12, and xiv. 11, and two in Amos, v. 23, and vi. 5-in which, by comparing the two versions, it will be seen that as yet authorities differ about the right word to best express nebel. "If you understand a thing clearly," says some philosopher, "you can explain it to others." Perhaps the revisers were not quite certain as to the meaning of the word nebel, and so left "viol" in three of the passages above named. In the second (Isaiah xiv.) they have, however, curiously changed "viol" into "lute."

We have already spoken about the Hebrew word neginoth. We are now going to refer to it again in connection with the headings of the Psalms. In some cases the Revised Version makes these much more intelligible. Take for example, Psalm iv. In the Authorised Version it is entitled "To the chief Musician on Neginoth"; but in the Revised Version it reads, "For the chief Musician; on stringed instruments." Again, in Psalm vi. the Authorised Version has "To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith"; but the Revised Version reads, "For the chief Musician; on stringed instruments, set to the Sheminith." Commentators are not agreed as to the meaning of the word "Sheminith"; but, anyhow, the new readings convey more sense to our mind than the old ones. There is the same difficulty with regard to the word "Alamoth" in Psalm xlvi. We would call attention to verses 20 and 21 of chapter xv, of the First Book of Chronicles, where these two words are used, and where, as in the Psalms, the Revised Version has "set to" in place of "on."

Neginoth is supposed, as stated above, to mean "stringed instruments." There is also the word Minnim, supposed to be a poetical expression for the same. It is so translated in Psalm cl., " Praise him with stringed instruments." The word also occurs in Psalm xlv. 8. The Authorised Version has "out of the ivory palaces whereby they have made thee glad." Dr. Stainer, in his "Music of the Bible," published a few years ago, suggested inserting "the stringed instruments" between "palaces" and "whereby." In the revised version this has actually been done, though without the definite article. The word Higgaion in the Revised Version has been left untranslated in Psalm ix. 16. In Psalm xcii. 4, it occurs again, though, perhaps, in a different sense, and is translated. A marginal note, as in the Authorised Version, would have been acceptable. We notice that the word Selah, the real meaning of which it seems impossible to find out, does not, as in the Authorised Version, form part of the text, but is written in smaller type and in parenthesis. It has been very rationally supposed that as it is only found in Psalms which have a musical superscription, it is probably a musical term. We would have added something about the expressions Michtam and Maschil, but space compels us to hasten to a close. difficulty of understanding many of the names in the headings of the Psalms is sufficiently great, but the difficulty has been rendered greater if it is true, as one Biblical commentator asserts, "that many titles were wrongly placed at first, or have suffered a confusion since.

We have referred to wind and stringed instruments. With regard to instruments of percussion, we would, in conclusion, call the attention of our readers to two curious passages in I Sam. xviii. 6, and 2 Sam. vi. 5, and ask them to compare the different readings and marginal notes of the Authorised and Revised Versions.

It is a remarkable feature in Wagnerism that the enthusiastic disciples of the great master adopt means widely different from those which have been deemed advisable at various times to bring the works of other divinely gifted composers into the light. We have our Bach Choirs and our Handel Societies, and similar organisations are to be found in all parts of the world where the art of music has found a home; but the object of all these bodies is performance, not discussion. The composers are made to appeal to the public by their works, and if these fail to find acceptance no amount of argument would be of any avail. It has always been, and perhaps always will be, otherwise with respect to Wagner. The reason may be found in the method of procedure adopted by the man himself. He was not content to give his music to the world with the declaration, "This is what I have to say. Accept it or reject it as you please." He flung himself into the arena of controversy, and waged wordy war with the world. The polemical spirit which he manifested at all times is now inherited by his followers, and they go forth with pen and tongue to preach that which is not so much an art as a creed. This will explain the manifesto of the London branch of the "United Richard Wagner Society," which will be found on another page, and even the very existence of the Society itself. Every work of the poet-composer and operatic reformer has been heard in London, and, in nearly all instances, an enthusiastically favourable verdict has been recorded. To ordinary observers it might, therefore, seem that nothing more remains to be done. But your true Wagnerian does not let the grass grow beneath his feet. A younger generation is always springing up, and no opportunity must be lost for spreading the doctrines, as well as their exemplification, of the great leader. Besides, the times, operatically, are out of joint, and for the first time since 1874 no complete opera of Wagner is likely to be heard this year. Consequently the faith must be kept alive by other means, and we find that conversaziones are being held and papers read. enthusiasm is truly admirable, and testifies to the earnestness which characterises the devotées of an art movement without parallel in the present century. Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, a prominent worker in the Wagnerian field, is engaged in writing his reminiscences of the deceased master. The volume should be very interesting, as Mr. Praeger knew Wagner intimately for many years, and will, doubtless, be able to give us a further insight into the dual personality of the man-harsh and bitter before the world, but genial and tender in all that appertains to social and family life.

We remember once seeing a composition for the pianoforte in which Italian words were placed over almost every bar, so that the notes could scarcely be read in consequence of the multiplicity of directions as to how they should be played. This, of course, appears very ridiculous; but after all it is only carrying to a pitch of absurdity a very useless custom. We have commented on this matter before, and now only return to it in consequence of repeated questions from correspondents, and from the conviction that no reform can be instituted unless the evils complained of are constantly kept before the public. Assuredly we do not require to be told that a flowing melody is to be performed smoothly, and in a singing style; that a pathetic theme is to be played with expression; or that delicate and refined passages are to be rendered gracefully. Neither is it necessary to remind the performer that a lively piece is to be given with spirit, or a March in the style of a March. Such directions, indeed, are usually disregarded by students, and to cultivated artists they become positively irritating. A good master will tell his pupils that everything appearing upon the paper must be strictly observed; but how will he teach them to play "sadly," "lovingly," or "bitterly?" It is very true that the words "con dolore," "amoroso," or "amarezza" are used to express these feelings; but they mean no more in Italian than in the plain English which we have used; and we cannot but think that by the use of such direc-composition, and ought to be rigidly attended to; but a student should be taught to read not only the notes, but the meaning of his music. As exemplified in Beethoven's Sonatas, good works speak for themselves, but inferior ones may require bolstering up with words. A high-class painter does not think it necessary to tell us what animal he intends to represent in his picture, but a child often writes under his daub, "This is a horse."

A LEADING article in our contemporary, The Globe, a short time since, tells us that the most popular style of music, and by "popular" is meant that which is most rousing, most appealing, most caredispelling, most resuscitating, is "something with a chorus"; and afterwards justifies this assertion by saying "let an untrained observer attend a Concert made up of a medley of scientific and of popular, although not vulgar, music, and note to which pieces the most general applause is given by a discerning and, in other matters, a cultivated audience, and it will be very strange if he does not find science shunted to make way for swing. course this can scarcely be put forward as a discovery; for everybody must be aware that, however cultivated an audience may be in "other matters," if it is not cultivated in the particular "matter" of music, some of the very worst items in a Concert programme will be the most enjoyed. But the article from which we have quoted is headed "The Magic of the Chorus," and it is to the decline of what the author terms "chorusing" that the especial attention of the reader is directed. In the treatment of this subject, however, we cannot but think that the writer becomes somewhat mixed, for even supposing that people's choruses are now more rarely heard than formerly-and this we are by no means inclined to admit-surely it is not desirable that they should be resuscitated at the expense of higher class compositions. "The Girl I left behind me," "For he's a jolly good fellow," and many others named in this paper are stirring enough when time and place accord with the feelings which they express—and we should be glad if some of the inane songs, "with chorus," of the present day were half as good-but if (as it is hinted) because a certain portion of an audience would prefer to listen to such effusions, we are to "shunt science," and "make way for swing," in an artistic atmosphere, we had better at once give up the idea of educating the masses, and allow the masses to educate us.

It would be impossible to insert one half of the letters we receive in complaint of the superficial manner in which music is too often taught at schools; "pieces," it is said, being selected which rather cover the defects of a bad system of tuition than display the merits of a good one. In one of these communications, now before us, the writer boldly asserts that many young ladies who can scramble through Fantasias they have heard, and perhaps even "dash through a Sonata of Beethoven," are totally incapable of explaining the difference between simple and compound time, and could not correctly insert the bar lines were an unbarred piece of music given to them for the purpose. Now, with every desire to aid in putting an end to so false a method of teaching, we cannot but think that the authors of these letters are either ignorant of what is now going on in the world of music or are in too great a hurry for results. With tions the real dignity of music is lowered. All words the fact before us that thousands of our fellow denoting variety of tone and time are of course creatures can neither read nor write, we establish absolutely essential for the due performance of a board-schools; but many years must elapse before the effect of these can be made evident. So when we institute musical examinations throughout the country, we can scarcely expect that every pianoforte player is at once to become an accomplished theorist. Not only must the pupil be made aware of his or her deficiency, but pressure must be put upon the teacher to reform his system of instruction, and for all this we must learn to wait. We know that the seed has been sown, and that we shall in time reap our reward; but we shall do no good either by endeavouring to force its growth or by deploring the state of the ground before it was carefully ploughed and prepared for healthy cultivation.

A copy of the Lancet has been recently forwarded to us and our attention drawn to an article on "Writer's Cramp," the cure of which, by a comon Writer's Cramp, the cure of which, by a combined application of massage, gymnastics, and caligraphic exercises, is claimed for Mr. Wolff, of 19, Berkeley Street. The writer of the paper—A. De Watteville, physician in charge of the electrotherapeutical department, St. Mary's Hospital—tells us that he is himself thoroughly convinced of the soundness of Mr. Wolff's method of treatment, that he has in vain looked through literature for similar results; and in order to illustrate the extraordinary cures effected by the system, he publishes the details of two cases, the facts of which speak for themselves. Of course the testimonials recording miraculous restorations to health and vigour daily appearing in the public papers are usually accepted at their real value; but the experience of an eminent physician written for a medical journal of such high standing as the Lancet deserves the serious consideration of all interested in the subject; and as those who are in the daily habit of using their pen, whether as contributors to the store of literature or music, may some day unfortunately find a failure in their powers of writing, it is well to know where an effectual remedy can be obtained. In the first of the cases cited, the patient was incapable of doing more than trace "four or five very short lines of very shaky characters" in about seven minutes; and in the second case—a lady—we are told that a discomfort in the arm on writing increased so rapidly as to produce perfect powerlessness; tremors in both arms gradually made their appearance, and she was compelled to give up writing altogether. Under Mr. Wolff's care both these sufferers were completely cured in a very short time. We may mention that facsimiles of their handwriting, both before and after medical treatment, are appended; and these illustrations, attested by such undoubted authority, may be received as reliable and conclusive evidence.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT having triumphed over the disease which at one time so seriously threatened his life, is now arranging for his fifty-first annual benefit, which will take place in Drury Lane Theatre on the 23rd inst. The programme, so far as announced, is chiefly dramatic, and some of our most eminent theatrical artists have offered their services. It is to be hoped that the venerable knight will have a "bumper" house.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

In the advertisement columns of our present issue will be found an announcement of considerable interest and importance. Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have resolved to take up the work begun by them in 1869, and carried on under the name of Oratorio Concerts, first in St. James's Hall, then in Exeter Hall, and afterwards at the Royal Albert Hall. The reason for this determination must formance of Oratorio, and especially at the limited facilities now given for the production of new works. We are sure that no one will disparage the existing organisations by which Oratorio is given from time to time. Yet, while putting full value upon their doings, it must be obvious that there is room for some such enterprise as the one now contemplated. In appealing for public support, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have a right to recall the Oratorio Concerts of the past, as indicating the spirit which amateurs reasonably look for in those who are their caterers. The Oratorio Concerts were the first to introduce a lower musical pitch in the hope of initiating a general and much desired reform. They also revived long-neglected works, such as Bach's "Passion" ("St. Matthew"), Handel's "Jephtha" and "Belshazzar," and Beethoven's Mass in D. We may expect the coming performances to rival these achievements in interest and value. The appointment of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie as Conductor will be accepted on all hands as a sound guarantee of completeness and efficiency. Under that distinguished musician, let us hope the performance of Oratorio in London will take the rank that properly belongs to it.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

On the 7th ult. Massenet's Opera "Manon," which has already been played with marked success at Liverpool and other towns by the Carl Rosa Company, was performed for the first time in London, its reception fully justifying the verdict of the provincial audiences and critics to whom it has been submitted. The story is by no means an agreeable one, yet it has engaged the attention of Auber, who wrote the music to Scribe's libretto on the subject, and produced an Opera called "Manon Lescaut," but few pieces in which are now remembered. MM. Meilhac and Gille supplied the version composed by Massenet; but we can scarcely imagine that without the valuable aid of Mr. Joseph Bennett, who has prepared the book for English audiences, it would have been accepted with favour in this country. As it now stands, however, the incidents are remarkably well adapted for musical setting, the variety of characters, the many exciting situations, and the numerous opportunities for scenic display, well sustaining the interest throughout. Briefly, the plot of the Opera is as follows: The curtain rises upon the courtyard of an inn where several travellers are arriving, and amongst them Manon, who is on her way to a convent, which she is to enter against her will. She and the Chevalier des Grieux meet and fall in love with each other, to the annoyance of Lescaut, Manon's cousin, who warns her against any admiration which may be bestowed upon her beauty. Guillot Morfontaine, a wealthy old roue, has also been captivated by Manon's beauty, and is chagrined at finding that she has eloped with Des Grieux. In the second act the lovers are in Paris, where they are followed by De Brétigny, another lover of Manon's, and his associate Lescaut, whose rage is appeased by Des Grieux promising to marry Manon. She, however, wishes for greater riches than Des Grieux can give her, and the act concludes with the forcible carrying off of Des Grieux by De Brétigny and Lescaut. The third act commences in the gardens of the Cours de la Reine, during an open-air fête. Manon, who has become the mistress of De Brétigny, has not lost all affection for Des Grieux, and hearing he is about to take holy orders, follows him to St. Sulpice, prevails on him to abandon his intention and return to her. In the next act Des Grieux is at a gambling house, playing with Guillot, and invariably winning, the cards having been supplied and prepared by Lescaut, but without the Chevalier's knowledge. Suspicion being aroused, the cheat is discovered, and the Chevalier is arrested, Manon also being taken as his accomplice. Count des Grieux, father of the Chevalier, saves his son from punishment, but Manon is condemned to transportation. On the road to Havre, worn out with illness and fatigue, she meets the still faithful Des Grieux, and, after a passionate love-scene, dies in his arms. It will be seen that in some respects Manon resembles the now popular character Carmen; but the heroine of Massenet's Opera is less heartless than that of Bizet's, and the music of her part, therefore, is more emotional; in some of the impassioned scenes-especially appear to all who look at the present means for the per- that between Manon and Des Grieux in the seminary of a high order. It cannot be said that the colouring of the lighter portions of the work is ever striking, or that more is attempted than a melodious and appropriate setting of the words; but the music is always agreeable, and passes along so pleasantly that we care not too critically to dis-sect it. Where, however, the composer sees fit to show his real dramatic power he is almost invariably suc-cessful, in proof of which we may cite the duet in the seminary already referred to, and the final scene of the Opera, portions of which are extremely fine. Amongst the solos, the song for Manon, "A simple Maid," that for Des Grieux in which he relates his dream, and the bright little melody for Manon, with refrain, "List! 'tis the voice of youth," must be mentioned in the warmest terms of commendation, the delicate and varied instrumentation in all these pieces - and indeed throughout the Opera-materially aiding the vocal effects to all musical ears. We must also allude to an especial feature in the work, that of preserving the characterisation of each of the dramatis personæ, which is happily effected by simple and legitimate means, a word of praise being likewise due to the clever manner in which the spoken dialogue is accompanied. The Opera was exceedingly well rendered throughout, Madame Maric Roze singing and acting the part of Manon to absolute perfection, Mr. Maas giving the utmost effect to the music of Des Grieux (which suited him admirably), and Mr. Charles Lyall, as Guillot, making quite a prominent character of the old beau, although we do not see why he should have so disfigured his face as to make it really unpleasant to behold. Mr. Ludwig, as Lescaut, Mr. Walter Clifford, as De Brétigny, and Mr. Burgon, as the Count des Grieux, were also thoroughly satisfactory, and Misses Fenn, Bensberg, and Burton, in subordinate parts, fairly responded to the small demand made upon their powers. The Opera was placed upon the stage with that completeness in every detail to which we are now accustomed at this establishment, and the reception of the work (which was ably conducted by Mr. Goossens) was most enthusiastic, the principal vocalists being-often to the detriment of the action of the Opera-warmly applauded during the performance, and Mr. Carl Rosa being compelled to bow his acknowledgments at the fall of the curtain. Amongst the revivals during the month, "Mignon," with Madame Julia Gaylord as the heroine, has been highly successful; and the morning performances have attracted large audiences. We must also mention that Goring Thomas's Opera "Nadeshda"—the production of which was noticed in our last number-has been several times repeated, and received with increased favour at each representation. At the time of our going to press, the termination of the season was announced for Saturday, the 30th ult., when Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" was to be given.

THE chief interest of the fifth Concert, on the 6th ult., was the presentation of a Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, by Antonin Dvorák-which had only once before been performed in this country, at the Crystal Palace-and the first appearance at these Concerts of the exponent of the work, Herr Franz Rummel, a pianist of whose exceptional powers highly laudatory accounts had already reached us. It was impossible that the Concerto could be placed before a London audience under more favourable circumstances, for the composer was there to conduct it, and the executant entrusted with its rendering proved himself thoroughly competent, not only to master with the greatest ease the excessive difficulties of the work, but in the minutest detail to fully reveal the meaning of its author; and we were glad to find that the hearers amply evidenced their appreciation of this fact by the warm applause accorded to the pianist, apart from the positive ovation bestowed upon the composer. The first impression we receive in listening to Dvorák's music is that, both in the conception and treatment of his themes, he is thoroughly original; and that, although obviously conversant with classical models, he allows them to exercise rather a friendly influence than a tyrannous sway over the construction of his works. The opening movement, commencing with the grave string instruments.

St. Sulpice-displaying true and unexaggerated pathos of accompanied by horns, clarinets, and bassoons, is rather in the orthodox tutti form, announcing a portion of the matter afterwards to be discoursed upon; but from the entrance of the solo instrument the composer is in no way restrained by what others have written before him, giving, in fact, free vent to his musical feelings, and throwing a rich glow of colour over the whole of the movement by the masterful treatment of his orchestra. The slow movement has perhaps less of "form" than that which precedes it; but the thematic material is charming and the movement consequently ends before the critical power has been sufficiently roused into activity for cold analysis. The Finale is full of life; and written, both for solo instrument and orchestra, with a true knowledge of effect. Throughout this elaborate movement all is as clear and intelligible as the veriest "purist" can desire; and, as we have said, the enthusiastic marks of approbation at its conclusion must have convinced both the creative and executive artist how highly their combined efforts were estimated by the large and critical audience assembled. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor (taken at a somewhat slower pace than we are accustomed to), Sterndale Bennett's Overture "The Wood-Nymphs," and that to "La Sirène" (Auber), and a selection from "Romeo et Juliette" (Berlioz) evidenced the good effect of Sir Arthur Sullivan's influence over the orchestra; and the vocalist, Miss Carlotta Elliot, who proved that Weber's "Softly sighs" was beyond her provers, gave an excellent rendering of "There's a bower of roses" from C. V. Stanford's "Veiled Prophet." An exceptionally fine performance of a Nocturne and Polonaise of Chopin, by Herr Rummel, completed a most attractive programme.

The sixth and last Concert of the season, on the 20th ult., introduced Herr Moszkowski, a composer little known in this country save by a number of very clever and original pianoforte duets. The work selected for the occasion was his Symphonic Poem "Johanna d'Arc," and as it had the advantage of the composer's own conductorship, and was played by a skilled orchestra, every justice may be said to have been rendered to its merits. No composition is more dangerous to handle than one which, like this, appeals to an audience as "programme music"; and yet, in deference to its being divided into the conventional number of movements, must also be judged as a Symphony. Young composers, however, especially cling to this form because, being desirous of making their music "descriptive," and yet fearful of being thought too innovative, they believe that they can enlist the sympathies of the advocates of the "advanced school," as well as those of the stern upholders of the "classics." Moszkowski's "Johanna d'Arc" fails as a work of art only because of this double aim of a really gifted composer; but he fails in good company. The work is full of melody, original thought, and charming effects of instrumentation; but the attention of the hearer is so intent upon a perusal of the catalogue of events, in the annotated programme, which the music is designed to illustrate, that much of it has passed away before he has had time to admire its many abstract beauties. We may say that the best parts of the work, which consists of four movements, are where the composer has allowed himself to forget or ignore the course of his story; and, indeed, even in that portion headed "Inner Consciousness; Former Memories," we doubt whether the wish to write a really attractive movement did not override the desire to depict the "inner consciousness" of Joan of Arc. Of course, it would be absurd on a single hearing to do more than record im-pressions of so elaborate a work; but we may say that, although lacking continuity of thought, there are some very masterly points in the opening Allegro (illustrative of Joan's pastoral life), that the movement already referred to introduces some perfectly lovely phrases, in deep sympathy with the feeling indicated, and that the Finale (Joan in prison, her Triumph, Death and Apotheosis) contains evidence of real power which will no doubt be matured in works yet to be heard, especially as we find that this "Symphonic Poem" was written at the age of twenty-five. The most enthusiastic applause was elicited after each movement, and at the conclusion of the performance the composer was twice recalled to the platform. In the second part of the programme Herr Franz Rummel gave an exceedingly fine rendering of Beethoven's piano-forte Concerto in E flat, which was warmly applauded. The vocalist was Mr. Santley, who sang Sullivan's "I wish to tune my quiv'ring lyre," and Handel's "Sorge infausta"; and the Overtures to "Der fliegende Hollander" (Wagner), and "Mireille" (Gouncd), were the orchestral pieces, both of which (under the excellent direction of Sir Arthur Sullivan) were admirably performed.

Or the nine Concerts announced by Herr Richter, five were given before the close of May, and the season is, therefore, more than half over without the achievement of anything particularly distinctive. It seems to us a pity that this enterprise should be limited in so great a measure to a particular class of works. Sooner or later, the inevitable result of weariness will come, whereas by taking a wider scope the Concerts might go on as long as the Viennese conductor chooses. In the programme of the Viennese conductor chooses. In the programme of the first Concert (April 27) two classical names appeared— Schubert and Beethoven, the first being associated with the symphonic fragment in B minor; the second with the These were magnificent selections, un-Symphony in A. Symphony in A. These were magnificent screening undoubtedly, and right well were they played. We cannot call to mind a finer performance of Schubert's music. It was within an ace of the ideal perfection which no mortal orchestra will ever attain. The rendering of Beethoven's work was less finished, but the "No. 7" is always reasonably safe in Herr Richter's hands, and certain, at any rate, of a thoughtful reading. The modern school had as its representatives at this Concert the overture to "Tannhäuser," the introduction to "Parsifal," and Liszt's fourth Hungarian Rhapsody. We are not tempted to comment upon these works, since those of Wagner are very familiar, while that of Liszt, though heard for the second time only, has but the little artistic value which belongs to its class. It need not be said that all were finely rendered. Herr Richter and his orchestra are at their best when music of this kind is in hand.

At the second Concert Herr Richter actually presented a Symphony of Haydn to his patrons—as, it may be, a cold douche in the midst of a prolonged hot bath. The old master's delightful art could scarcely have proved acceptable to those who love the "maddening excitement" of modern music. If it were acceptable, then we cannot sufficiently admire the wide taste that takes in such far-sundered extremes. With the Haydn Symphony was presented the "C Minor" of Beethoven. On this occasion Wagner contributed his "Meistersinger" Overture and "Siegfried Idyll"-two of the best exemplifications of his genius in the sense of being works which all can hear with pleasure. Again did the orchestra show how well it plays Wagner. There was scarcely a minute point upon which criticism could lay its finger, saying, "This might have been better." Lizzt's "Mephisto Walzer" completed the programme, wherein, we say emphatically, they had no business to be. A contemporary describes them as " nocturnal emanations from a marsh of commonplace," and the expression is so felicitous that we adopt it. The skill of the orchestration presents a different question, That we are quite ready to acknowledge and admire.

To the third Concert (the 11th ult.) classical music contributed Beethoven's Cantata, "Mecresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," the same master's second Symphony, and as a modern example of the classic school, Brahms's Rhapsody for alto solo, chorus, and orchestra. This was a large allowance, preponderating so far as to give character to the occasion; Wagner and Glinka contributing but one piece each on the other side—viz., a selection from the "Ring des Nibelungen," and a Fantasia, entitled "Komarinskaja." The vocal pieces made no great impression, although the choir sang extremely well. Sooth to say, Beethoven's so-called Cantata is not one of his finest and most distinctive works, while the Rhapsody of Brahms is, in great part, so sombre and dreary that it would be affectation to associate it with the idea of artistic pleasure. At their choice ungraciousness itself cannot cavil. One of the two composers is so eminent that no piece from his pen should remain unhonoured, while the other com-classic art. Glinka's Fantasia ranks among orchestral trifles, but is a clever example of the Russian master, and full of the character that national melodies rarely fail to give. Wagner's music showed, as a selection, considerable skill. Detached from the play it loses significance, of course; but much of it has abstract merit more than enough to secure interested and admiring attention.

In the programme of the fourth Concert (the 18th ult.) was the Introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's "Meistersinger," a most delightful example of the master in his quieter and more restrained mood. No one can hear this piece withmore restrained mood. No one can near this piece without unfeigned pleasure or—if he be opposed to Wagner's artistic principles—without regret that he so largely diverted his talents from their highest use. Liszt's contribution was his fifth Hungarian Rhapsody, not before heard in England. This work is elegiac, not to say funereal, in character, and presents one or two beautiful melodies. But, as usual, Liszt here becomes stilted and bombastical. He had only to dress the melodies in artful orchestral colours to achieve a distinguished success, but he must needs associate with them a good deal of what in music is the equivalent of melodrama as once presented at "Queen Victoria's own Theayter." The Overture to "Manfred" was indifferently played, but that to "Oberon" went splendidly, as did at least two movements of the Eroica Symphony.

The fifth Concert (the 21st ult.) presented Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Mendelssohn's Hebrides Overture (fancy Mendelssohn at a Richter Concert!), and Brahms's Academy Festival Overture; against which more modern art set Wagner's magnificent Dead March from "Götterdämmerung" and two selections from "Das Rheingold." This selection tells its own story, and a general commendation of the performance is all that need be added.

MR. GEAUSSENT'S CONCERT.

THE performances at this Concert, given in St. James's Hall on the 13th ult., were not all that could have Hall on the 13th ult., were not all that could have been desired, but shortcomings were largely made up for by a programme which, as respects its high character, might be copied with advantage. Mr. Geaussent resolved, in the true spirit of an artist, that he would connect his name with worthy things only. Hence he selected Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "Jason" and Mr. Dvorák's "Patriotic Hymn," a novelty just published with a dedication, inspired by "deepest gratitude," to the English people. To present these works Mr. Geaussent used his own choir and engaged an orchestra comprising many of our best players, while Madame comprising many of our best players, while Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley answered for the solos. It is regrettable that the result did not come up to expectations, and that, consequently, many who attended with high hopes were sent away disappointed. With such a programme, however, the Concert could not fail of significance.

Dvorák's Hymn is a work written some years ago, but never till now published. It served, we believe, to bring the composer before his own countrymen for the first time in a serious capacity, and it commended him to favour by reason of the passionate patriotism which animates every page. The Czechs have their national aspirations like other races over whom strangers rule, and the poetry of Dvorák's Hymn-forcibly rendered into English by Dr. Troutbeck—speaks the language of grief and of hope, lamenting the present, but rejoicing in dreams of a better future. Dvorák has treated the seven verses of Hálek's lyric for orchestra and chorus only, observing no recognised form in doing so, but dividing his music into short movements, each running without a break into its successor, and all following closely the changeful sentiment of the words. The music is marked by considerable elaboration of structure, freedom of style, and intensity of expression. It depends for effect chiefly upon harmonic treatment and orchestral colour. There are in it, nevertheless, effective contrapuntal passages, and many melodic phrases of a deeply sentimental character. Over all is an air of distinction and masterfulness which at once impresses the hearer, and brings him into conscious connection with power. Not every passage, it may be, would pass muster with critics mands attention for all he does by his near relationship to of purist tendencies, but no one will deny that here we have a remarkable work. Mr. Dvorák conducted the performance, and had the gratification of receiving cordial approval from an audience well able to judge what they heard. The "Patriotic Hymn" will find its way into the repertory of choral societies all the country over.

"Jason" was conducted by Mr. Geausent, and we refer to the performance merely for the sake of acknowledging the admirable singing of the artists named above, and paying deserved compliments to Mr. Mackenzie for the manner in which he has strengthened the work by adding a complete scena for Orpheus, balancing that sung by Medeia. There is much beauty and abundant spirit in the new number, while it serves to lift the tenor part out of its former secondary rank. We may hope that, ere long, "Jason," so often unfortunate in its rendering, will have better luck, and present itself before the public as the interesting and admirable work it undoubtedly is.

SENOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

THE continued success of these performances is almost phenomenal, and can only compare with the fever of excitement which prevailed when Rubinstein was giving his recitals. In his way Señor Sarasate is as remarkable an example of the artist-virtuoso as the Russian pianist, and the public is naturally attracted towards a performer who not only excels all his fellows in the same sphere, but who exercises his skill in a manner requiring no musical training in the listener to appreciate and comprehend. This Señor Sarasate does, but in justice to him it must be gladly acknowledged that he also appeals to those of cultured tastes, and invariably includes some works of the highest class in his programmes. Thus at his Concert on the 2nd ult. he essayed Beethoven's Concerto, the greatest test of a violinist's powers, and one that does not lend itself to the peculiar idiosyncracy of the Spanish performer. Purity and sweetness of tone and perfect intonation are admirable qualities, but Beethoven's work demands breadth, dignity, and masculine vigour, and in these Señor Sarasate is somewhat deficient. He was at his best in the Larghetto, and least satisfactory in the first movement, in which he introduced a prodigiously difficult, but most un-Beethoven-like Cadenza. A Caprice in two movements, by Guiraud, proved to be a melodious and pleasing Morceau in the French style. The rendering of Mozart's Symphony in E flat, and selections from the "Rosamunde" music of Schubert, by Mr. Cusins's orchestra, cannot be highly spoken of. The playing in the symphony was especially coarse and slovenly.

At the third Concert on Monday, 11th ult., Señor Sarasate brought forward a Violin Concerto in G minor by Emil Bernard, a Parisian organist and composer. It is a well-written work, the first movement being the most commendable in a musicianly sense. The Andante reminds the hearer, longo intervallo, of the middle movement of Mendelssohn's Concerto, and the Finale consists mainly of showy passages for the solo player. The novelty was immediately followed by Mendelssohn's Concerto, which received a truly wonderful interpretation. The work brings out all the best qualities of Señor Sarasate's style, and his performance would demand unqualified praise but for the excessive speed adopted in the final movement. Allegro molto vivace is not synonymous with prestissimo, and though the player maintained unfaltering precision, the effect was nevertheless that of a scramble. But the perfect phrasing in the first movement, and the exquisite singing tone in the Andante, would atone for graver faults. The pieces in the Spanish style from the violinist's own pen, which he introduced at both Concerts, were mere Jours de force, not needing serious criticism. At the Concert on the 14th ult., the orchestral works were Beethoven's Symphony in F, No. 8, and Sterndale Bennett's overture, "Paradise and the Peri," to which a tolerable amount of justice was done.

MDLLE. CLOTILDE KLEEBERG'S RECITAL.

In some seasons London is invaded by an army of foreign pianists, who devote themselves with greatly varying success to the task of extracting gold from the pockets of the musical public. Perhaps the war scares and reports of monetary depression have reached their ears, and kept them | evening's proceedings.

at home this year. But whatever the cause, we are indebted for performances mainly to resident musicians, among whom we are now proud to number Mdlle. Kleeberg. This young French artist made her first appeals to London amateurs in a very modest way, but her merit was quickly recognised, and during the past winter she gained conspicuous success at the Crystal Palace and Popular Concerts. It was therefore not surprising to find St. James's Hall well filled at the first of two Pianoforte Recitals announced to be given on the 9th ult. and the 6th inst. The charm of Mdlle. Kleeberg's playing consists in the refinement of her method, and the clearness and purity of her execution. She is in no degree a sensational performer, nor is it likely that she will ever attain to absolute greatness in her art. she plays with consummate intelligence, and if she never astonishes the listener she never fails to satisfy his artistic requirements. There are specialists who exhibit remarkable ability in one particular school, and are more or less unsatisfactory in every other. Mdlle. Kleeberg is not one of these, but a good all round executant, who will play Bach, Beethoven, or Chopin with equal acceptance. The programme of the recital on the 9th illustrated this. The principal items were Bach's Suite Anglaise in A minor and Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, both of which were admirably rendered, though we confess to thinking that the first and last movements of the Sonata are more effective when taken a shade slower. Some minor pieces by Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, and Mendelssohn were charmingly given, and the recital ended with a group of trifles by living composers, of which the most attractive was a Passepied by Délibes.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE last of the four Subscription Concerts of this institution, which took place on the 18th ult., included, as a special feature, a Cantata expressly composed for this occasion by Dr. Gladstone, and conducted by the composer. The new work in question is entitled "Constance of Calais," and in its musical elaboration furnishes another instance of the relative artistic importance and general musical interest which a clever and versatile composer may infuse into a somewhat trite subject, and prosaically worded libretto. The subject is "an incident that oc-curred at the capitulation of Calais, to which town Edward III. laid siege after the battle of Cressy," the King granting free departure to all the citizens on condition "that six of the principal inhabitants should be delivered up to him to be put to death." It is by the speedy and heroic intercession of Constance St. Pierre, the devoted wife of one of the six chosen victims, with the Queen of Edward III., that the dread issue is averted, and the Queen herself appearing on the scene to plead the cause of Constance of Calais, or, as the chorus has it-

The Queen will appeal to the King, And in every heart is the spring Of a confident hope rising high. Her gentle compassionate soul Will soften, will soothe and control, And the prisoners condemned shall not die.

all ends happily. If after the above (by no means unfairly) quoted example of the general "poetic" value of the libretto of "Constance of Calais," we add that the composer has succeeded in raising a very interesting musical super-structure upon such groundwork, we mean to infer high praise. Dr. Gladstone, indeed, in the present instance, has made the utmost of a very questionable opportunity of displaying his sense for variety of rhythm (as for instance, in the chorus "Hush! the shouts of victory!"), and of giving most melodious utterance to sentiments the most hackneyed, and verses the most commonplace (as for instance, in the duet "I go to die"). The instrumentation of the Cantata is throughout skilful and effective, predisposing the hearer from the outset for the stirring up of intellectual and emotional experiences which, chiefly on account of the insipid text, are doomed to be disappointed. The work was, on the whole, well performed, the soloists having been Madame Catherine Penna, Miss Evelyn Gibson, Messrs. Iver McKay and Alfred Moore. A selection from Haydn's Symphony No. 11, and from Handel's "Alexander's Feast" concluded the

MADAME FRICKENHAUS AND HERR LUDWIG'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE first of a series of four Chamber Concerts, of the Monday Popular type, given under the auspices of the above-named artists, took place on the 14th ult., at Princes' Hall, in the presence of a numerous and appreciative audi-The judiciously selected programme included, amongst the chamber works properly so called, Kiel's interesting, but (if we except the charming and exceedingly characteristic "tempo di menuetto") somewhat austere, and at times, laboured Pianoforte Quintet in A major (Op. 75), as well as Beethoven's String Quartet in F minor (Op. 95); both having been admirably played by Herr Ludwig, Mr. G. W. Collins, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. White-house; Madame Frickenhaus presiding at the pianoforte in the former work. The lady pianist gained well-deserved applause for her refined and brilliant rendering of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" which, but for its occasional lack of poetic animation and appreciation of the composer's intentions, would have been absolutely perfect. Herr Ludwig also contributed two instrumental solosviz., a Nocturne by Ernst, and Variations by Paganini, wherein he proved himself a virtuoso of no mean attainments on his instrument; he indeed carrying away the lion's share of the applause bestowed during the evening. The programme was interspersed with vocal duets (Dvorak and Mary Carmichael) pleasingly rendered by Miss Louise Phillips and Madame Fassett, Miss Mary Carmichael having been the accompanist. These interesting Concerts (the second of which was announced to take place on the 28th ult.) bid fair to become an annual institution in the metropolis, and we heartily welcome the prospect in the interests of the art in its highest and purest manifestations.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE annual Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, which took place in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday, the 20th ult, was chiefly noticeable as being the first occasion on which any portion of Dr. Stainer's Oratorio "St. Mary Magdalen" has been performed in the Cathedral. The work is somewhat too lengthy for performance in its entirety at a church service, at least on any occasion when full evensong and a sermon are indispensable; and therefore a selection (lasting exactly one hour) was made from his work by the composer, the numbers omitted being numbers 2 to 6, 12 to 14, and 18. The Cantata was thus brought within the limits of a Festival Anthem, but at a decided cost, we are inclined to think, not only to the narrative, but to the music also, from the dramatic as well as the æsthetic standpoint. The tenor and bass solos were sung by Messrs. Kenningham and Kempton, of the Cathedral choir, and the treble solos by two of the Cathedral choristers; but of the performance as a whole it is not possible, owing to the defective arrangements made for the press, to speak critically. For the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis Dr. Martin's well-known setting in A was used, and Sullivan's fine overture "In Memoriam" (which has been previously heard on several similar occasions) was played by the orchestra immediately before the commencement of the service. The sermon was preached by the Dean of Windsor, the Rev. H. D. Macnamara intoned the prayers, and Dr. Stainer conducted.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

WITH lengthening summer days and outdoor recreations it would perhaps be inconsistent if these indications were not accompanied by an almost complete dearth of all that is interesting in the musical world.

What may be looked upon, however, as the last classical entertainment of the past season proved to be singularly successful from more than one point of view, and the audience which Señor Sarasate attracted to the small Concert-room of St. George's Hall on April 25 was not lacking in either numbers, interest, or even enthusiasm. As might naturally be inferred, the programme of the Spanish virtuoso chiefly comprised items of dance music and Bohemian airs, calculated to put to the and its refinement, dramatic feeling, and musical charm test, and show to advantage, the phenomenal powers of technique which have placed Señor Sarasate in the front rank of modern violinists. His rendering of the Andante and Variations from the Kreutzer Sonata, and of Mendelssohn's Concerto was generally characterised by a breadth of conception and warmth of treatment which more than compensated for an occasional weakness of tone, more particularly noticeable in the Andante movement of the latter work. Mr. W. G. Cusins was at the pianoforte, and played, amongst other items, Thalberg's fantasia " Mosè

The performance at St. Anne's Roman Catholic Church. Edgehill, on Sunday the 17th ult., of Gounod's Mass "Guardian Angels," was interesting from the fact that this is the first occasion on which it has been rendered in Liverpool since its introduction at the Musical Festival in 1874. Gounod is always at his best in impressive church music, and the recent performance, under the conductorship of Mr. W. J. Argent, with full orchestral accompaniment, evidenced careful training, and an intelligent grasp of the ideas of the composer.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE merry month of May has not been very prolific in high-class music, and beyond one or two suburban Concerts, and sundry performances of English ballad and comic opera at the theatres, the month's record is a barren one. On the other hand, the work of preparation for the Musical Festival of August next, has been carried on with a good deal of vigour, and substantial progress has been made in the choral rehearsal of new works. The whole of the choruses of Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," of Dr. Bridge's setting of the Latinised version of "The Rock of Ages," of Mr. Anderton's "Yuletide," and of Mr. Villiers Stanford's short Oratorio "The Three Holy Children," are now out of hand, and with the current month of June the chorus commences the rehearsal of Gounod's "Mors et Vita." Mr. Cowen's work apparently is still somewhat behindhand, owing to the composer's temporary indisposition, but no doubt is entertained of his ability to fulfil his contract in good time. Dr. Hans Richter has paid several visits to Birmingham, and has settled the composition of the band, which though numerically somewhat smaller than on the last occasion, is expected to prove more efficient owing to the care with which it has been selected.

True to its self-appointed mission of finding out and producing comparatively unknown or neglected works of interest, the Amateur Harmonic Association at its second and final Concert on April 30, performed here for the first time in England, Joachim Raff's quaint "Tageszeiten" ("The Hours of the Day"), a kind of Fantasia for chorus, orchestra, and pianoforte obbligato. The English version, specially prepared for the Concert, was from the pen of Mr. J. T. Threlfall, M.A. The work, which was first produced at Leipzig in December, 1873, consists of four numbers, entitled respectively, Noon, Evening, Night, and Morning, all of them exhibiting musicianly skill and poetical fancy, but somewhat failing in musical interest, and especially the charm of melody. The lines, however, are flowing and graceful, the treatment throughout being lyrical, and the skill and scholarship of the composer are frequently vindicated by happy pieces of orchestration and the frequent employment of contrapuntal devices, culminating in the final number in a fugue. pianoforte part, which on this occasion devolved upon Miss Agnes Miller, is conspicuous throughout, but more especially in the first and last sections; whilst the choral part is generally subordinated to the instrumental. The performance was a somewhat unequal one, and it would be unfair to pronounce positively upon the merits of so novel a work until it has been heard under more favourable conditions. Another interesting item of this Concert was the first performance in Birmingham of Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander," produced at the Worcester Festival of September last. Since that performance, the composer has amplified the love duet, but in other respects the work remains essentially unchanged, were as cordially recognised at Birmingham as at Worcester. The third and concluding novelty of the Concert was Mr. Thomas Anderton's Cantata "The Norman Baron," a choral and orchestral setting of Longfellow's ballad—flowing, vigorous, and fairly characteristic—originally written for and produced by the Middlesbrough Musical Union.

The performance of Gounod's "Redemption" by the Midland Musical Society, in aid of the funds of the Jaffray Suburban Hospital, was chiefly interesting as showing the practicability of giving a fairly effective performance of that exacting work with limited orchestral resources, and without the assistance of vocal "stars." Although the performance cannot be said to have been perfect, the general effect was so good as to elicit the hearty and frequent applause of the large audience present.

Among the minor musical incidents of the month may be mentioned an open rehearsal by the Tonic Sol-fa Council Choir of Niels Gade's Cantata "The Crusaders," which took place on the 5th ult. at Aston, and the miscellaneous vocal and instrumental Concert given by the Misses Hetherington and Ascough at Handsworth. Chopin's Polonaise in A and Thalberg's "Home, sweet home" afforded ample scope for the display of Miss Ascough's abilities as a pianist, whilst her coadjutor revealed an excellent contralto voice and good method in sundry vocal selections—Italian and English.

Mr. Sims Reeves, after a lengthened interval, re-appeared here on the stage of the Theatre Royal, on the 20th ult., in the part of Henry Bertram in "Guy Mannering," when he showed that in voice, as in dramatic intelligence, he may still brave comparison with any tenor on the operatic stage. He was well supported by Miss Philippine Siedle, Miss Adelaide Newton, and Mr. Fox. Mr. Reeves was also announced to appear two nights later, in the part of Captain Macheath in "The Beggar's Opera," but at the eleventh hour bills were posted up on the theatre doors announcing that in consequence of indisposition Mr. Reeves was unable to appear, and there would be no performance. On the 11th Mr. J. W. Turner essayed the part of Henry Bertram in "Guy Mannering" at the Grand Theatre, and experienced a very cordial reception.

He was supported by Mr. Aynsley Cooke, Madame Clara
Leslie, and Miss Ada Roby, but the performance altogether was a somewhat unequal one.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT,)

In most Yorkshire towns people are now beginning to take their music in the parks, and the concert season has come to a close. Beyond the fact of the commencement of these popular promenade concerts al fresco, there is scarcely anything of note to record of the past month.

Messrs. Christenson and Haddock have attracted considerable attention by the recital of the complete set of Beethoven's Sonatas for the piano and violin. These were given at two Concerts in the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, These were held on April 28, and the succeeding Friday. Both performances were fairly well attended, and the experi-ment, for such it really was, succeeded beyond expectation considering the boldness of the scheme. It speaks well for the two executants that the interest of the audiences was well sustained, and they are much to be commended for providing such a pleasant and instructive course of musical study.

One of the many interesting Concerts for which the season will be remembered in Bradford was that of the Manningham Vocal Union, which took place on the 5th ult., and served to bring together a large audience. The programme was a notable one, and its quality and boldness was justified by the performance. It included two novelties, so far as the Bradford public are concerned—namely, C. Harford Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "On shore and sea." These are works which, as most people are aware, offer considerable scope to a chorus of well ascertained powers, and in this instance the music was rendered with tolerable precision and freedom, although the performance was capable of improvement in many respects. The accompaniments were supplied public were concerned, upon equal terms. It must be by the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, whose evident that the reason why the real musicians of the efforts, although full of promise, were scarcely equal to the exacting duties which they were called upon to perform. The vocalists were Miss Clara Jowett, Mrs. Ashcroft Clarke, Miss E A. Blackburn, Miss Coates, Mr. A. Broughton, and Mr. C. Kingsley, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit. Mr. W. Rees lent valuable assistance as leader of the band; and Mr. Rooks conducted the combined forces with musicianly skill.

Most readers will know that the Leeds Musical Festival Committee entered into arrangements sometime ago with Herr Rubinstein to produce a new work for the Festival next year. It is now stated that the Russian musician cannot fulfil his promise. A correspondent, writing to one of the Leeds papers, suggests that the place vacated by Herr Rubinstein should be filled by a young English composer, and goes so far as to name Dr. Creser, the talented young organist of Leeds Parish Church. Dr. Creser, he says, is engaged upon an important and Dr. Creser, he says, is engaged upon an important and serious composition which possesses many remarkable and meritorious qualities. The writer continues: "Those who have merely heard Dr. Creser's previous choral work, 'Eudora,' and under the very unfavourable, not to say damaging, conditions of its production in Leeds three years ago, can have but little, if any, conception of what he is really capable as a composer. A slight acquaint-ance even with this new work would, I am sure, serve to open the eyes of many, revealing, as it assuredly does, musical power and ability of an order for which I myself was certainly not prepared. The work itself is in Cantata form, and the story it seeks to illustrate is based on the old twelfth century romance of Hartmann Von der Aue, so beautifully reproduced by Longfellow in his "Golden Legend." The libretto, as in Dr. Creser's earlier work, is written by Professor G. F. Armstrong.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

On April 29, a deputation from the General Council of the Society of Professional Musicians, consisting of Dr. Henry Hiles (Manchester), Dr. Edwin Crow (Ripon), Mr. Arthur Page, F.C.O. (Nottingham), Mr. Arthur Smith, Mus. Bac. (Derby), and Mr. James Dawber, Mus. Bac. (Wigan), visited Bristol "To consider the present state of the musical profession, and the necessity of attempting to improve its present position and prospects." The meeting took place in the Council-room of the Museum, under ing took place in the Council-room of the Museum, under the presidency of Mr. George Riseley, and among the large company present were Messrs. The Chairman, after cordially welcomises the distinguished deputation on behalf of the musical ing the distinguished deputation on behalf of the musical profession of Bristol, called upon Mr. Page to explain the objects and working of the Society. Mr. Page, in an interesting address, urged the necessity for trying to improve the present position of the musical profession, and pointed out the injury it sustains from overcrowding, by utterly incompetent teachers, and from isolation. He mentioned that he lived in Nottingham seventeen years without knowing intimately a single musical man, and beyond his own town he hardly knew the names of any musicians. Since the Society had been started he had made at least fifty intimate friends of musical professors. He instanced the success which had attended the movement in the north, and expressed a hope that in the West of England the movement would be equally successful. Mr. Edward Chadfield, general secretary, said that the rules told them what the Society intended to be-a Society of professional musicians. Three words expressed the position of musicians at the present time-disorganisation, isolation, and spolia-If they considered that men in the profession had devoted years of their lives, their money, and their time in acquiring knowledge and skill in the art, it was neither more nor less than spoliation for people who had done nothing of the kind to enter into competition, as far as the no means to distinguish, simply, broadly, and generally, a qualified person from an unqualified one. The intention was to embrace in the Society all professionals who were entitled to be so called. The admission to the Society was simple, requiring merely an application, the nomination by one member of the Council, and being seconded by another member. As soon as any district had twenty members it became a section in itself, and elected its own council, governed itself, and held meetings to discuss subjects relating to the profession. Each section would send two delegates to the Central Council. Dr. Hiles, in an able speech, dealt with the objects and aims of the Society. He observed that until two years ago musicians had no means of speaking with authority or unanimity, but now the present Society had a membership of 300, and he thought it probable that in five years the Society would include at least half of the teachers in England whom they desired to see members. The Chairman confessed himself a little disappointed that the conditions of membership did not include an examination, and expressed his belief that as time went on such a condition would be added to the rules. He advo-cated such an examination being imposed as would stamp a person as being a qualified musician, as was the case in law, medicine, &c. He then moved, "That this meeting cordially approves the aims and objects of the Society of Professional Musicians, and will give it hearty support, believing that the development of the Society will benefit the art and those who practise it." Almost without exception those present then subscribed their names as members of the Society, so that, according to the rules, a western section will be at once established

The last Concert of the season, arranged by the Bristol Musical Association, being the 32nd of the series, was given on Saturday, the 9th ult., at Colston Hall. The attendance was very numerous, and included the Mayor and Mayoress. The chief item performed was "The Ruins of Athens," in which choir and orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. George Gordon, acquitted themselves creditably. The remainder of the programme was miscellaneous. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Jones (soprano), Mr. E. T. Morgan (tenor), and Mr. Montague Worlock (bass). Signor Nicola Coviello gave some solos on the cornet with his usual artistic finish, and Mr. Riseley contributed a couple of his ever-welcome organ solos. The Association has certainly had a successful season as far as music and attendance are concerned, and we trust also that the pecuniary aspect has not been unsatisfactory.

The most interesting musical event of the present season in Bristol took place on Wednesday, the 13th ult., namely, the long looked for performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner." The Concert was a complimentary one given by the Monday Popular Concerts Society to their honorary Conductor, Mr. George Riseley, as some little recognition of his invaluable services to them during the past two seasons. Mr. Riseley was thus enabled to fulfil what has long been one of his most earnest wishes, the presenting of all the Symphonies of Beethoven in a complete form before Bristol audiences. The Choral was the only one wanting to complete the list, and now that also has been added. The performers were Mr. Riseley's band and choir, numbering 300. Of their work it is almost impossible to speak too highly. The Of their choir has been rehearsing weekly for the past three months, under the alternate tuition of Mr. John Barrett and Mr. Riseley, which may account for the happy result. The attack was far beyond anything we have hitherto heard in Bristol, as were also the light and shade and the enunciation, this last quality being especially remarkable. For so large and trying a work as the Symphony no doubt the choir was a small one, but nevertheless it was fully equal to the demands laid upon it. The one-weak point was the insufficient number of altos. Their tone was extremely good, being full and round, but they were somewhat overweighted by the other parts, and the addition of twenty to their ranks would have been a great improvement. The brilliance of the sopranos was, throughout the evening, most remarkable, their high notes ringing out with the utmost clearness, and without the smallest hesitation or faltering. There was evidently great enthusiasm country suffered so much was from the fact that there were felt in the whole body of singers, and they sang the last chorus of the evening quite as freshly as the first. may instance a few specially striking numbers they were, in the Symphony, the Adagio "O ye millions," with the following Allegro Energico "Sing then of the heav'n descended daughter of the starry realm," and the last prestissimo movement "O ye millions." And in the "Ancient Mariner," we may instance the ladies' choruses "The bride hath paced into the hall," and "This Seraph Band"; the chorus for male voices "The loud wind never reached the ship," and the choruses "And now the storm blast came," "About, about, in reel and rout," and "The upper air burst into life," as examples of what choral singing really ought to be, for the performance of these numbers was as near perfection as possible. As for the band, the rendering of the Symphony was a real treat, and throughout the evening the orchestral performance was most admirable. The soloists were Miss Farnol, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Thorndike. With the exception of Miss Farnol, they were well known to Bristol, and fully sustained their high reputation. Miss Farnol made a decided success in her solo "The fair breeze blew," and Miss Rees sang "O sleep it is a gentle thing " with exquisite taste. Mr. Thorndike also gave "Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship," with great effect, and Mr. Kearton was successful in " The harbour bay." The Colston Hall was crowded as we have hardly ever seen it at these Concerts. Mr. Carrington was, as usual, the leader, and Mr. Riseley, who was received with loud and long-continued applause, was the able Conductor. After such an unqualified success, we trust that the Society will see its way to making at least one Choral Concert a feature of their season.

Mr. Riseley gave Organ Recitals at Colston Hall on the 7th, 16th, 23rd, and 30th ult., which were fairly well

The Bristol Orpheus Glee Society gave a Concert, in aid of the Bath Hospital, at the Assembly Rooms, Bath, on April 28. There was a crowded attendance, and the Society fully sustained its high reputation for thoroughly finished singing. Mr. George Riseley was, as usual, the Conductor, and after the expenses of the Concert were paid, there was a balance of £40 to be handed over to the charity.

The nineteenth Concert by the Salisbury Vocal Union was given on April 29, in the Hamilton Hall, to a crowded audience. The first part was a selection from "Samson," the soloists being Madame Eva Scorey, Miss Lily Mullings, Mr. J. M. Hayden, Mr. Arthur Fowles, and Mr. Arthur The chorus singing was excellent throughout. The second part was miscellaneous, the principal feature being a violoncello solo by Mr. J. Pomeroy, of Bristol. Mr. Alfred Foley ably led the band, Mr. F. T. Wells was solo flute, and Mr. A. J. Saunders solo trumpet; Miss Winifred Harwood and Mr. Charles A. Rogers presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively, and Mr. J. M. Hayden conducted.

Miss Aylward gave her first Chamber Concert of this season, at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 21st ult., when she was assisted by Mr. A. Burnett, (violin), Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, (violoncello), and Miss Amy Aylward as vocalist. The programme included Gade's Trio in F, Op. 42, Beethoven's grand Trio in B flat, Op. 97, Mozart's Sonata in B flat, for piano and violin, a violoncello solo, splendidly played by Mr. Whitehouse, "Czardas," (Fischer), and a pianoforte solo by Miss Aylward (Schumann), which was encored. Miss Amy Aylward sang "Connais tu le pays" and "Quand tu chantes" (Gounod) with violin obbligato by Mr. Burnett, also songs by G. F. Cobb, Jensen, &c., which were exceedingly well received. There was a large audience, who highly appreciated the performance. Mr. Augustus Aylward will start his Popular Orchestral Concerts again early in the autumn.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On April 27, the St. Andrew's Amateur Orchestral Society gave the second Concert of the sixth season in the Edinburgh Literary Institute. The orchestra, numbering about sixty members, performed fairly well, and on the whole showed much improvement. The principal items character, while, as far as could be judged from the pianoforte in the programme were Romberg's Symphony, Op. 6, in E flat; a Vorspiel from "Konig Manfred," by Reinecke; a Mazurka, "Lena," composed by Mr. Paton, the Conductor; a violoncello solo, "Romanze," by Balbastre, played by Mr. Paton; a Suite (Corelli), and a Concerto for Violin (Viotti), excellently rendered by Miss McGregor. Miss Annie Grey delighted the audience by her singing of Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Handel's aria "Cangio d'aspetto," and the old English ballad "The Three Ravens."

Señor Sarasate, with Mr. Cusins as pianist, appeared before a well-filled house in the Music Hall, on the 4th ult. Señor Sarasate delighted his audience by a faultless rendering of Mendelssohn's Concerto, which, although intelligently accompanied by Mr. Cusins on the pianoforte, made one wish for the presence of an orchestra. Further items were the Second Suite for Violin, by Franz Ries, Schubert's Rondo in B minor, instead of Raff's Violin Suite, as promised in the programme, Señor Sarasate's own Fantasia on airs from Gounod's "Faust," and an arrangement of Chopin's Nocturne in E flat, Op. 9, No. 2. Mr. Cusins's solos for the pianoforte were an Etude of Liszt, a Fantasia of Thalberg ("Mosè in Egitto"), and a "Valse Brillante" of his own com-

On the 8th ult. Herr Otto Schweizer's pupils gave an interesting evening Concert in the Masonic Hall. crowded audience testified to the wide esteem in which he is held, and the performance to his success as a teacher. The programme included a Concerto of Bach (C major) for two pianos, Beethoven's third Concerto, the Waldstein Sonata, a Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 2) by Liszt, and two movements of a Suite (Op. 23) by Herr Schweizer—all of which were played from memory. Miss Annie Grey and Mr. Arthur Edmunds contributed, as vocalists, solos and a duet, and a ladies' choir sang three trios by Herr Schweizer
—"The Knight and the Lady," "Vox Amoris," and " Sympathy.

The choir of St. Aidan's Church gave a successful Concert in the Masonic Hall on the 12th ult. The principal items in the programme were Mendelssohn's " Hear my Prayer," and a Trio for pianoforte, violin and cello by Mr. J. M. Sinclair, the Conductor. The Trio is a tuneful and spirited work, and shows distinct promise on the part of the composer.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A PERFORMANCE of Gadsby's Cantata " The Lord of the Isles" was given by the Rutherglen Choral Society on April 28, conducted by Mr. William Macintyre.

The seventh annual Concert by the Glasgow Academy Choir took place on the 8th ult., in the Queen's Rooms. The choir numbered in all about 100 voices, about fourfifths being the pupils (boys) of the Academy, and the other fifth old pupils and friends, in the tenor and bass parts. A. R. Gaul's Cantata "Ruth" formed the first part of the programme. The choruses were very well executed, as far at least as the boys were concerned, for the tenors and basses gave rather inadequate support. Among the solo voices special mention may be made of the youth who took the part of Naomi. His singing was marked by refinement and grace. The chief item in the second part was Adolf Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," which was rendered with intelligent appreciation and taste. Among the minor numbers in this part was a part-song, "The Seasons," the music by C. Hall Woolnoth, a local musician. Mr. Woolnoth's composition is clever and promising, but can hardly be described with correctness as a part-song, the accompaniment being too prominent a feature. Mr. John Maclaren, who has set an example in the Academy Concerts that is well worthy of imitation, conducted.

A fairy Cantata, entitled "Dame Hulda," by Mr. Arthur J. Waley, was produced at the Queen's Rooms on the 12th ult. The Cantata is written for ladies' voices, solo and choruses, with the addition of a tenor solo part. Mr. Waley's music is lively enough, if occasionally wanting in dramatic significance and point, and there are frequent indications of musical invention of a highly promising and harmonium accompaniments, not a little knowledge seemed to be possessed of orchestral effect. The ladies sang the choruses with spirit, although they were not always equal to some of the vocal difficulties or the extreme range of the music. Mr. C. Hall Woolnoth conducted with vigour, and Messrs. Waley and Hewitson presided at the piano and harmonium respectively.

A Recital of organ music was given on the 11th ult. on the new organ of Hillhead Baptist Church, by Mr. W. S. Hoyte, of All Saints', Margaret Street, London. The instruent has been built by Messrs. Lewis and Co, the builders of that in St. Andrew's Hall. Mr. Hoyte's programme did not contain anything very new, but it was marked by taste and discrimination.

The Glasgow musical season may now be considered at an end for the time being. We have had a very active winter, and, on the whole, improvement has gone along with activity. Apart from the important annual concert scheme of the Glasgow Choral Union, which every year advances in interest and character, and which of course occupies the largest place in the regard of musical people, the efforts put forth by the other greater musical Associations are not to be overlooked, though unfortunately in one or two instances the measure of refinement attained is disappointing. The semi-private musical Societies—those, it may be explained, which are supported by the subscriptions The semi-private musical Societies-those, it of both an honorary and effective membership-have contributed in a highly important degree to widen our musical knowledge and culture by the production of numerous important compositions, chiefly contemporaneous, and it is earnestly to be hoped that no circumstances will arise to lessen the number and value of these Societies. Church Choir Concerts have been more than usually numerous in the past season, and have shown improved judgment in the selection of music, as well as advancing taste in execution. For the last year or two we have also had, for the first time in the musical history of Glasgow, a body of resident instrumentalists of really excellent executive These musicians are accustomed to play together under a competent directing hand, and their services have been greatly in requisition for the orchestral accompaniments of Oratorios, Cantatas, &c., and for chamber and other instrumental performances. The present gratifying state of musical matters in Glasgow is undoubtedly due, in a wide and general sense, to the disinterested example and enterprise of the Glasgow Choral Union; but it is not too much to say that the high degree of cultivation of the graces of choral singing, which is now a feature here, is very specially due to the example set some years ago by Mr. H. A. Lambeth with his Select Choir, and continued so ably and successfully by the Glasgow Select Choir.

Mr. Channon Cornwall, Organist of Sandyford Established Church, was accidentally drowned in the Port Dundas Canal on the night of Monday the 4th ult. Cornwall came to this city nine or ten years ago, from Chichester, I believe, and held a high reputation as an executant. He was accompanist to the Choral Union at the weekly choral practisings, having held the post, with much acceptance, for five or six years.

The Ayr Choral Union, whose yearly scheme of Concerts is in relationship, as far as the orchestra is concerned, with that of Glasgow, held its annual meeting on the 14th ult. In the report submitted the directors thanked the members for their hearty response to the appeal made by them at the beginning of the season to clear off the deficit of the previous year, thus allowing them to begin the season's work free of debt. The season had unfortunately again proved unsatisfactory in a financial respect, but the Society, notwithstanding discouragement, had well maintained its position in point of membership and attendance at practisings, and in the rendering of the works undertaken. The income amounted to £295 38. 11½d. and the expenditure to £419 138. 3d., leaving a deficiency of £124 98. 32d. I have no expectation that this result of the past season's exertions-discouraging as it is in one respect-will have any effect in abating the enthusiasm of the Ayr Choral Union, which is merely passing through the experience of our own Society, before financial success had crowned its own self-denying educational efforts.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, May 12, 1885.

SINCE the last review of musical doings in America appeared in these columns, the season in opera and concert halls has come to an end. The past month has been almost barren of occurrences of moment in the Metropolis as well as elsewhere. The Symphony and Oratorio Societies, whose plans had been sadly disarranged by the death of Dr. Damrosch, crowded half of their list of Concerts into two weeks, and the performances showed the influence of the hasty preparation and carelessness of results which was to have been expected. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society (whose Concerts ought to be included in the local system), and the New York Chorus Society, also finished their seasons. I am therefore able briefly to give a review of what has been accomplished in six months in New York for the sake of the interested who may wish to institute a comparison between the musical activity of the American and British Metropolis. In this review, it must be understood, all Concerts are omitted which are not given under the auspices of an established institution devoted to the cultivation of high-class music. For the hundred and one big and little Concerts given by private persons or for charity, I have neither time nor space.

The Philharmonic Society has given six Concerts in the Academy of Music, and the same number of public rehearsals; the Symphony Society has given six Concerts and six rehearsals; the Oratorio Society four Concerts and our rehearsals; Mr. And er Stucken four Novelty Concerts, with four rehearsals; Mr. Thomas six Concerts for Young People; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Thomas's direction, eight Classical Concerts without; and the New York Chorus Society three Concerts without rehearsals. The public rehearsals referred to differ in no respect from the Concerts, except that they are held on the afternoon of the day preceding the Concert date. From this enumeration it will be seen that the American metropolis has enjoyed this season sixty-eight Concerts of the highest class of music. The attendance at the Concert of the New York and Philharmonic Societies was limited only by the seating capacity of the rooms in which they were given, and the other Concerts were well, if not liberally, patronised.

Of new works of magnitude we have heard quite a list, aside from those enumerated in the review of the Novelty Concerts in this place last month. Five symphonies by composers of note were brought out as follows :- Brahms's Third in F major, Frederic H. Cowen's Fourth or "Welsh," Sgambati's in D major, Godard's Symphonic Gothique, and Felix Draeseke's (2nd) in F. The last mentioned work formed part of the scheme of the last Concert of the Symphony Society, and found extremely little favour with the critics of the newspaper press. Of works which had previously been heard, but which are seldom performed, I may mention Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, given by the Symphony Society, and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, which had a brilliant interpretation by the Philharmonic Society and Mr. The full list of large choral works given is as follows:— Handel's "Messiah" and "Judas Maccabæus" (Oratorio Handels "Messiah" and "Judas Maccabeus" (Oratorio Society), Liszt's "Legend of St. Elizabeth" (Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), Mozart's "Requiem" (Brooklyn Philharmonic Society), Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" (Chorus Society), Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and Verdi's "Requiem" (Oratorio Society), and Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" (two parts, parts), and Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" (two parts, parts). Brooklyn Philharmonic Society). Mr. Mackenzie's dramatic oratorio was brought forward for the first time in America at the last Concert of the Chorus Society on April 16, in Steinway Hall. Had it been given when it was first promised, Mr. Bennett, the compiler of the book of words, would have been enabled to hear it, but the Society was unable to redeem its promise, and the work consequently fell near the close of the season. The performance profell near the close of the season. The performance publishing spined by the postponement, though it was far from being as perfect as it ought to have been in view of all the circumstances. The choir numbered about 350 voices. Mr. Thomas's band played the accompaniments, and the solo parts were in the hands of Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. Max Heinrich, and Mr. Ivan Morawski. The solos all went well (except that it was disturbing to hear the Teutonic pronunciation which Mr. Heinrich gave to the text), likewise the orchestral parts and the bulk of the choruses. The third part dragged a good deal, however, and the close was the reverse of brilliant. The work was given with the composer's London "cuts," but even then was found to be too long, and the bulk of the applause was harvested in the early portions of the evening. Mr. Thomas has taken the score with him on his Western tour, and the oratorio, or portions of it, will be heard during the early summer in a number of places, including Chicago. A special interest attached to the work in the eyes of music lovers here from the fact that Dr. Damrosch gave musical treatment to the same subject a few years ago. His cantata, however, treated the "Song of Solomon" in a purely lyrical fashion, yet with much success in several portions. The prelude to the Cantata, which Dr. Damrosch called "Sulamith" (as Rubinstein afterwards did his opera on the same theme), was revived by the dead musician's son to open the fifth Concert of the Symphony Society's series, which was in memoriam of the Doctor. At this Concert, Herr Staudigl sang a ballad, for baritone solo and orchestra, entitled "Harved Harfager," and Fräulein Marianne Brandt sang three German lieder, like the ballad, the work of Dr. Damrosch The orchestra, besides Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, played a transcription of Schumann's familiar pianoforte Toccata in C, also from the pen of Dr.

Damrosch.

Mr. Mapleson returned to New York after his San Francisco and Chicago successes to give a brief spring season of only six representations, in which Madame Patti appeared twice and Miss Nevada three times. A similar season was also given in Boston, after which Mr. Mapleson sailed for England, only stopping long enough in New York to institute two suits at law, one against Signor Nicolini to recover 10,000, dols., for failing to sing when called upon, and one against Miss Nevada for 3,000 dols. alleged to have been overpaid her. These suits are looked on here as possessing only so much significance, as they indicate that Mr. Mapleson, if he returns at all next year, will return with another prima donna than Madame Patti.

The Symphony Concerts in Boston have come to an end, and Herr Gericke has returned to Vienna for rest and pleasure. Meanwhile Herr Neuendorf is experimenting there with some popular Concerts at cheap prices. In Baltimore the Oratorio Society gave a festival three weeks ago in which Mr. Thomas and his orchestra took part. The principal vocal choral work performed was Verdi's "Requiem."

OBITUARY

FERDINAND VON HILLER .- Almost the last personal link conspicuously binding our time to the era of great masters snapped on the 12th ult., when Ferdinand Hiller Our readers very well know the position passed away. which Hiller filled in the musical world for years past. As Director of the Conservatorium at Cologne, Conductor of the Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, whenever it took place in the city of St. Ursula, author of literary works which, like the "Recollections of Mendelssohn," passed into all European languages, and composer of music bearing the hall-mark of lofty talent, if not absolute genius, no man occupied a larger space in the realm of the divine art. Not long ago Hiller ceased from active work, and settled himself to the rest befitting old age. But, as often happens, this was only a short prelude to a profounder and eternal repose. He died in his seventy-fourth year, honoured and regretted by musical Europe.

Hiller was born at Frankfort, October 24, 1811, two years after his friend Mendelssohn. At an early age he showed musical talent, the development of which his parents so encouraged that he is said to have publicly played a Concerto by Mozart, and begun composition, when only ten years old. Subsequently, Hummel became his master for two years; the youth, at the end of that period, starting upon an independent career. Hiller gravitated to Paris almost as a matter of course; the French capital being then the capital, also, of European art. There his remarkable talent secured a good position even at a time when Paris swarmed with gifted musicians. Under no necessity to work for a living, he laboured for renown, not only in composition and on the Concert-platform, but in the class-room; rapidly achieving distinction everywhere, at the same time deriving all possible advantage from intercourse with Chopin, Liszt, Cherubini, Berlioz, Meyerbeer, and many other distinguished men, to whose intimacy he was admitted. Hiller remained in Paris seven years; returning to Frankfort in 1835, and taking with him his celebrated Studies, a Pianoforte Concerto, and other works. Soon leaving his native town once more Hiller went to Milan, brought out an opera, "Romilda," and began composing his oratorio "Die Zerstörung Jerusalems." In 1841, he was again in Italy; and, two years later, in Leipzig, as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts; thence he went to Dresden, working hard as conductor and composer till 1847, when he removed to Dusseldorf. Three years later he finally settled in Cologne, the city of his ripened fame and of his death. Hiller was well known in London, thanks to occasional visits of a professional nature. He composed a piece specially for the opening of the Royal Albert Hall, and produced a Cantata "Nala and Damayanti," for the Birmingham Festival of 1870. His last visit to this country took place about twelve years ago, when he gave pianoforte recitals at the Hanover Square Rooms, and illustrated the art of improvisation on subjects suggested by the audience. He was essentially a master of the classical school, and could write music faultless in or the classical school, and could write music faultiess in construction and marked by all possible technical skill. His works, however, lacked the qualities by means of which genius gives vitality to its creations. They were often "dry"—fatal fault, for which nothing can atone. Nevertheless, they showed distinguished merits which musicians, at least, could recognise and appreciate. Hiller, in the records of his art, will stand high among the dii minores, and even within the shadow of the throne of genius-not the loftiest place, but one worth gaining.

Brinley Richards.—This well-known professor died at Kensington on May Day. He was born at Caermarthen in 1819, his father then holding the post of Organist at St. Peter's Church. Mr. Richards was one of the many Welsh persons who owe their start in life to that often derided, but really useful institution, the Eisteddfod. Mainly through the opportunity it afforded, he entered the Royal Academy of Music, twice winning a King's Scholarship. His pupilage over, Mr. Richards settled in London as a teacher of the pianoforte; soon gaining a lucrative con-nection, and acquiring a certain kind of fame by the production of teaching pieces, morceaux de salon, &c. He was capable of better things than these, as some of his clever studies show, but circumstances condemned him to a particular class of work and kept him at it. His name will be perpetuated by "God bless the Prince of Wales" which has actually become a "national anthem" in the strictest sense. Of late years Mr. Richards dis-tinguished himself as a lecturer, chiefly on the music of Wales; in that capacity running very much counter to the opinions of his sensitive countrymen as to the origin of their national art. He was much respected by all who knew him, and ever sustained the dignity of his profession, doing so even at unruly Eisteddfodau when his larger views brought him into contact with ignorance and prejudice.

ALEXANDER REICHARDT.—The death of this once popular tenor singer took place at Boulogne on the 14th ult. Reichardt was born in Hungary, April 17, 1825, and first appeared on the lyric stage at Lemberg when only eighteen years old. Subsequently he joined the Court Opera, Vienna, and acquired considerable fame as a singer of lieder. He first came to England in 1851, singing at the Musical Union, Philharmonic Concerts, &c. Thence-forward, till 1857, he was a regular visitor during the season, frequently appearing on our lyric stage. About 1860 he settled in Boulogne, where for many years before his death he lived a retired, but not inactive life. He filled a conspicuous musical position in the town of his adoption, and established there a Philharmonic Society. Reichardt Composed a number of songs, some of which, especially "Thou art so near and yet so far," became popular.

THE outline programme of the Birmingham Musical Festival, which commences on Tuesday, August 25, is now published. On the opening morning "Elijah" will be published. On the opening morning "Elijah" will be given; and in the evening Mr. Frederic Cowen's new Cantata, entitled "The Sleeping Beauty," Mr. Prout's new Symphony, and a miscellaneous selection. Gounod's new Oratorio, "Mors et Vita" (composed expressly for this Festival), will be produced on Wednesday morning, and the evening Concert will include Mr. Thomas Anderton's new Cantata, "Yule-tide," and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's new Violin Concerto, to be played by Señor Sarasate. Thursday morning will be devoted to the "Messiah," and on the same evening a new Cantata, composed for the Festival by Antonin Dvoråk, called "The Spectre's Bride," and Mr. Gladstone's Latin translation of the hymn "Rock of Ages," composed by Dr. J. F. Bridge, will be performed. Dr. Stanford's new Oratorio "The Three Holy Children," and Beethoven's Choral Symphony will occupy Friday morning; and the Festival will conclude with a second performance of Gounod's new work in the evening. The vocalists engaged are Madame Albani, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Wade, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Signor Foli; solo violin, Señor Sarasate; organist, Mr. Stimpson; chorus master, Mr. W. C. Stockley; and conductor, Herr Hans Richter. The band, which will be complete in every department, will be augmented for "Mors et Vita." Birm ingham has indeed a right to feel proud of a programme of such varied interest and excellence, and every credit s due to all who have given their best efforts to the cause.

The 147th Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians took place at St. James's Hall on the 7th ult., Mr. Charles Santley in the chair. After the usual loyal toasts, Mr. Santley proposed "Prosperity to the Society," making an earnest appeal on behalf of those especially who devoted the whole of their professional lives to orchestral performance; and afterwards, in returning thanks for the toast of his own health, expressed his disbelief in the so-called progress of music in England, asserting that although the number of students had greatly increased during the last quarter of a century, the arena for the exercise of their profession had materially diminished. The artists who gave their services on the occasion were Miss Mary Davies, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Lazarus (clarinet), and Mr. Septimus B. Webbe (pianoforte), Herr Dvorák accompanying two of his own songs (exquisitely sung by Mr. Lloyd), Mr. E. H. Thorne accompanying Mr. Lazarus's solos, and Mr. Fountain Meen presiding at the pianoforte during the rest of the vocal music. Glees and part-songs were also contributed with much success by the Westminster Glee and Madrigal Union. Subscriptions were announced by Mr. W. H. Cummings to the amount of about £800.

On Monday, April 27, the fifth annual Concert of the Haggerston Hospital Society was given before an oversitowing audience, at the Shoreditch Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. F. M. Wenborn. The principal vocalists were Madame Rose Hersee, Madame Patey, Miss Featherby, Miss Francis, Miss Roby, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Bridson. The instrumentalists were Mr. John Cheshire, and band of harps, Mons. B. Albert (violoncello), and Mr. Turle Lee. The programme, which was miscellaneous, included a new song introduced by Madame Patey. It is believed that the German Hospital at Dalston will benefit by the Concert to the amount of over £100.

The St. Jude's, Peckham, Choral Society gave a Concert on Monday, the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. Walter Miller, the programme including Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great," and Dr. Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The soloists were Miss Alice Warr, Miss Nellie Smith, Mr. Henry Cooper, and Mr. C. E. Wheeler. Mr. Swinford Smith and Mr. R. B. Berks accompanied at the harmonium and pianoforte respectively. Mr. Miller, the Conductor of the Society, has been presented, on the occasion of his leaving St. Jude's for All Saints', Banstead, with a valuable silver-mounted bdton, suitably inscribed. The presentation was accompanied by a request that Mr. Miller, who founded the Society, would continue to direct it.

A VERY successful evening Concert was given by the members of the staff of the South-Eastern Railway on Wednesday, April 29, in aid of the funds of the newly-formed South-Eastern Cricket Club. The principal artists were Viscountess Folkestone, Lady Monckton, Madame Enriquez, Signor Foli, Mr. Henry Walsham, Mr. Wilford Morgan, and Mr. Pyatt. Viscountess Folkestone was accorded well-merited applause for both her songs, "The Valley" (Gounod), with violin and violoncello obbligato by Messrs. Louis H. d'Egville and Ernest Sandeman, and Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain." Madame Enriquez was highly successful in all her songs. Signor Foli, Mr. Pyatt, Mr. W. Morgan, and Mr. Henry Walsham were also thoroughly appreciated. A pianoforte solo was well played by Miss F. Scales, and Mr. Frank Barnard contibuted a violin solo. Mr. Eric Lewis gave a short musical entertainment between the first and second parts of the programme. The Orient Glee Company sang Bishop's "Hart and Hind," and Cooke's "Strike the Lyre." Mr. Abernethy and Signor Bisaccia presided ably at the pianoforte.

The Holborn Town Hall was well filled on May Day evening by an enthusiastic audience, on the occasion of Mr. J. T. Hutchinson's annual Concert. The first part of the programme was appropriately occupied with Sir Sterndale Bennett's Cantata, "The May Queen," the solos being admirably rendered by Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Alice Farren, Mr. Albert James, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, all of whom were heartily applauded. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, Mr. E. H. Turpin contributing a couple of organ solos, and Mr. Tobias Matthay two pianoforte pieces. Mr. Hutchinson was much applauded for his spirited and artistic rendering of "O Ruddier than the Cherry"; and among other notable items was a trumpet solo by Mr. Thomas Harper. A glee was very effectively rendered by the Herne Hill Choral Society, by whom the choruses in Bennett's Cantata were given. Between the parts Mr. Hutchinson was presented, by the members of the above-named Society, with a handsome silver-mounted ivory bâton, "as a mark of their warm appreciation of the patience, ability, and kindness displayed by him in his conduct of his Society."

"YE London Glee Men," under the direction of Mr. Richard Mackway, concluded the third season with a Ladies' Concert at the Cannon Street Hotel on April 30. Among the concerted pieces calling for special mention were the part-song, "How fair is the Rose" (Edwin Ball), "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun" (Sir John Goss), and J. H. Maunder's chorus, "Thor's War Song," all of which were given with much spirit, the last-named piece obtaining a well-merited encore. Mr. Walter Mackway contributed two pianoforte solos, the rendering of which was highly appreciated. The solo-singers were Mr. Francis Palmer, Mr. John Evans, Mr. Thomas Powell, and Mr. Richard Mackway, the latter achieving a great success in Walter's prize song from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and "She's fairer than the May" (E. A. Sydenham), both of which were re-demanded. A pleasing variety was introduced by the singing of Mr. Richard Mackway's Criterion Choir of Boys, who gave Berthold Tours's "Stars of the Summer Night," and other pieces, with very correct intonation and commendable precision.

MR. Walter Wesché gave a Concert at the Westbourne Schools, Westbourne Park, on April 30, on behalf of an institution in connection with the Lock Chapel. The chief feature of the Concert was the singing of Mr. Frederick Knight, who created a most favourable impression, and that of the choir of female voices trained by the Concert-giver. Mrs. Wesché, Miss Alice Rees, Mr. W. Dennis, and Mr. C. Catty (violin), also rendered valuable assistance, Miss M. Bright (pupil of Mr. Wesché) contributing some pianoforte solos in an artistic manner.

A SELECTION of music was given at St. John's Schools, New North Road, on Thursday, the 14th ult. The vocalists were Miss Gadsby, Miss Coe, Mr. A. E. Marshall, Mr. C. Jones, and Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Hibberd; Mr. J. Anderson (violin), and Mr. G. Hayes Marshall (elocutionist). The Very Rev. G. P. Pownall occupied the chair, and Miss Mary Gadsby ably presided at the pianoforte.

THE Kyrle Choir have given performances as follows:—
"The Messiah," in Holy Trinity Church, Victoria Docks, on April 2g; soloists: Miss Wike, Miss Clotidle Kapfi, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. E. A. Williams; Mr. E. H.
Turpin accompanist, and Mr. Malcolm Lawson, Conductor.
"Elijah," in the Scotch Church, Ossulston Street, Euston Road, on the 7th ult.; soloists: Miss Hoschke, Mrs. Oram, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. Jabez West; Mr. E. H. Lemare accompanist, and Mr. Albert Orme, Conductor, and the same Oratorio in Christ Church, Watney Street, E., on the 13th ult.; soloists: Miss Hoschke, Mrs. Oram, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme. "St. Paul," in St. Philip's Church, Clerkenwell, on the 20th ult.; soloists, Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Dora Perceval, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. James Blackney. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied, and Mr. Malcolm Lawson conducted on both the latter dates.

The eleventh season of the Crouch End Choral Society was brought to a close on Monday, April 27, at Christ Church Schoolroom, by an exceptionally good performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The soloists were Mrs. Lansdell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Frank Ward, all of whom acquitted themselves in a highly satisfactory manner. They were assisted in the quartets by Miss A. Scott, Miss J. Reed, Messrs. G. J. Tattersall, and Albert Popham. The choir, numbering 100 voices, was equally balanced, and did ample justice to the choruses. The accompaniments were played by a professional string quintet, led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson; Mr. J. G. Callcott, rendered valuable aid at the harmonium, Mr. Charles W. Lovejoy ably presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Alfred J. Dye, A. Mus. T.C.L. was the Conductor, as usual. "The Rose of Sharon," and "The Redemption" are announced for the 12th season.

Mr. WINDEYER CLARK gave a Recital on the fine organ at Westbourne Grove Chapel on the 19th ult. It was rendered particularly interesting by two Sonatas of Mozart for organ, and a band of bowed instruments, written during the master's Salzburg period, and rarely, if ever, previously played in England. The compositions are full of charm, and present many unwonted and delightful effects from the contrasted tones of the combined instruments. Mendelssohn's Sonata in C minor, Bach's Fugue in E, of which another version is extant in the key of C, and some pieces by Henry Smart, Gade, and Guilmant, showed the versatile ability of the player to great advantage. A clever Adagio by Merkel for violin and organ, and a portion of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (in both of which Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant was the violinist) elicited general admiration. The entertainment was varied by the singing of Mrs. Wilson Osman and Mr. Hutchinson.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 159th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 15th ult. Romberg's Cantata, "The Lay of the Bell," comprised the first part of the programme, the soloists being Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Minna Graham, Mr. Henry Yates, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, and Mr. A. Roach, all of whom did ample justice to their parts. The choruses were rendered with much precision and vigour. In the second part, songs were contributed by the same soloists, Mr. Musgrove Tufnail being particularly successful in "The Cavalier" (new song), by Stephen Kemp, and the choral music included "May Music" (Marzials), the solo being sung by Miss Louise Bond; "Come, let us all a-maying go" (Atterbury), and "The Nightingale" (Mendelssohn). Mrs. T. P. Fame presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

We regret that space will not permit us to give even a brief summary of a most interesting lecture delivered by Professor Ives at the Adelaide University on March 24. Unquestionably it is an important event in the history of the University, and in the progress of music in Australia, that, in addition to the power of granting degrees in music, that, in addition to the power of granting degrees in music, the University will henceforth give practical instruction in the art; and we sincerely congratulate the colony upon the appointment at the head of the musical department of a professor of the exceptional talent of Dr. Ives, who, it must be mentioned, was selected for this important post by Sir G. A. Macfarren and Dr. Stainer.

The Hampstead Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Willem Coenen, gave a Concert at the New Vestry Hall on the 18th ult., the programme, in honour of the bi-centenary of Handel, being selected from that composer's works. The choruses were remarkably well sung, the "Hallelujah" and "When His loud voice" creating a marked effect; and the solo vocalists—especially Mrs. George Gill in "Wise men flatt'ring," and Mr. Price in "Where'er you walk "—eliciting warm and well deserved applause. The utmost credit is due to Mr. Coenen for his excellent training of the choir, and to all the members for their due observance of his teaching. Miss Amy Gill presided with her usual skill and judgment at the pianoforte, and Mr. H. M. Higgs and Mr. W. G. Alcock were thoroughly efficient accompanists at the harmonium and American organ respectively.

An interesting Concert was given by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir at the Town Hall, Kensington, on the Lond ult., in aid of the Children's Hospital, Paddington. Reinecke's Cantata "The Enchanted Swans" occupied the first part of the programme, the principal vocalists being Miss Thudichum, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mrs. Blundell, Miss Lott, and Mr. Lucas Williams; the services of Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello), Herr Oberthur (harp), and Messrs. Mann and Standen (horns) being secured for the obbligato instrumental parts. In the second part, in addition to the singers named, Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Mary Davies contributed songs with much success. The Concert was excellently conducted by Mrs. O'Leary; Miss G. Johnson and Mr. Ernest Fowler accompanying. We are glad to say that the Hospital will realise fully £100 by the performance.

On the evening of Tuesday, April 28, Madame Lansdell Sims gave her Annual Concert in the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New Road. Her vocalisation was characterised by that earnestness which invariably accompanies her efforts, and in "Young England," a new song by Frederick Bevan, and in "The Lost Chord," she fully maintained the well-earned reputation she holds in the south of London. With the Concert-giver were associated a number of well-known vocalists, amongst whom we may mention Miss Pauline Featherby, Madame Riechelmann, who was most enthusiastically received in "Caller Herrin" and in the "Letter Song" from Planquette's "Rip van Winkle"; Madame Merton Clark, who sang Wekerlin's serenade, "Stars the night adorning," and "Lo, here the gentle lark"; Miss Matilda Roby, Mr. Joseph Hay, Mr. C. A. White, and Mr. Egbett Roberts.

We have much pleasure in drawing attention to the excellent portraits of Handel in the June number of The Magazine of Art, published by Cassell and Company. The frontispiece to the series is the Chandos portrait, painted by Thornhill for the Duke of Chandos, in which the composer is represented seated at the organ, and without the usual wig. Then we have that painted by Grafoni (now in the Fitzwilliam Museum), that by Schmidt (by permission of Julian Marshall, Esq.); the Vauxhall Statue by Roubillac (now in the possession of Henry Littleton, Esq.); the Gopsall portrait (painted by Hudson (by permission of Earl Howe), and a portrait from the miniature of Zincke's (by permission of Harrett Lennard, Esq.). They are all admirably engraved, and accompanied by a well written article upon Handel by R. A. M. Stevenson.

THE members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 196th monthly Concert on Friday, the 1st ult., in the Fimilico Rooms, Warwick Street, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday. The vocal soloists were Miss Nellie Watts, Miss Alice Grey, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Mr. Jonnell Balfe. The part-songs, which included compositions by Pearsall, Mendelssohn, Barnby, Eaton Faning, Pinsui, and Henry Smart, were extremely well sung by a choir of about seventy voices. Mr. Charles F. Reddie gave two pianoforte solos, the second of which was redemanded. The Concert concluded with a very good rendering of Sir George Macfarren's Cantata "May-Day," the soloist being Miss Nellie Watts, Mr. F. R. Kinkee and Mr. Kinkee very ably presided at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively.

MISS AMINA GOODWIN gave a very well attended Pianoforte Recital on the afternoon of the 5th ult., at St. James's Hall. If we add that the gifted young artist successfully went through the various numbers set down for her in the programme—viz., Schuman's "Faschings-Schwank" (entire), Allegro from Italian Concerto (Bach), a Vivace, and Concert Sonata (Scarlatti), Sonata, Op. 27 (Beethoven), three pieces by Chopin, "Lied" (Rubinstein-Liszt), Canon (Jadassohn), Staccatostück (Bülow), and Galop (Rubinstein), we think we have alluded to no trifling achievement, even in these days of extraordinary tours de force, the whole having been played from memory. Miss Goodwin's remarkable display of her versatile talents was relieved by vocal contributions ably rendered by Misses Gertrude Griswold and Lena Little.

A PERFORMANCE of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" was given by the Walworth Choral Society, on April 27, at Peckham Public Hall. With the exception of one or two defective entries, the choruses were interpreted in a highly praiseworthy manner, and did much credit to the singers. The solos received ample justice at the hands of Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss J. Cravino, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. H. Thorndike. The orchestral accompaniments were essayed by amateurs, and, difficulties considered, were fairly played, though forming the weakest point in the performance. Mr. W. E. Curtis conducted with much care, and merits high commendation for his efforts in the preparation of the work.

The Dedication Festival at St. John's, Red Lion Square, commenced on the 6th ult. (S. John, ante post lat.). The music, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Viner, consisted of selections from Dr. Philip Armes's "St. John the Evangelist," "O clap your hands" (Stainer), "How lovely are Thy dwellings" (Spohr), and "It came even to pass" (Ouseley). The solos in Dr. Armes's Oratorio were well sung by Mr. H. Bullock and Masters Mays and V. Read. It is to be hoped that the present temporary organ will soon be removed to make room for a much larger instrument, for which Messrs. T. C. Lewis & Co, have prepared a specification, and which is to cost £1,500.

In connection with the Surrey Conservatoire of Music, an excellent Concert was given at Brixton Hall, on Monday evening, the 4th ult. A special feature in a well selected programme was the clever violin playing of Mr. J. T. Carrodus, whose principal selection was the Andant and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. A couple of showy pianoforte pieces were contributed by Mrs. John Cheshire, and Mr. W. Sewell gave highly commendable performances upon the organ. The vocalists were Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Worrell, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Joseph Tapley, and Mr. Henry Blower. Mr. H. R. A. Robinson accompanied in an efficient manner.

The Monthly Smoking Concert of the Victoria Glee Club was held on Saturday, the 2nd ult., at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Victoria Street. Mr. W. Sexton conducted. The programme comprised "Strike the Lyre" (Cooke), "Maying" (Müller), "Hart and Hind" (Bishop), "A Franklin's Dogge" (Mackenzie), sung by the Hatton Quartet, "Banish, oh Maiden" (Lorenz), "The pleasant month of May" (Beale), &c. Songs were contributed by Messrs. S. Kessell, B. T. Waddams, C. R. Bayley, and J. W. Sanderson. Mr. James Hallé played a solo on the harmonium, and Mr. H. Porter a violin piece. The accompanists were Messrs. J. Hallé and Frank Swinford.

We are informed that the application of hydraulic engines to the large organ in the Royal Aquarium at Westminster by Mr. Blennerhasset, of 1a, Vernon Street, Pentonville, which has been in use since 1882, has proved very successful. The contrivance, which saves the labour of four hand-blowers, has been at work since the above date without the least interruption, and is now, apparently, in as good condition as when originally erected.

HERR FRANKE informs us that, the guarantee fund not having reached the amount that was required, he is reluctantly compelled to abandon the scheme of German opera for this season. The realisation of this undertaking at some future time, however, still occupies his attention, and the support already met with, and which promises to extend, makes him feel confident of ultimate success.

At the Music School in Baker Street, on the 15th ult., Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, having examined the candidates for the scholarships, assisted by the Head Music Mistress, awarded the senior scholarship to Mary Elizabeth Pittman, the junior scholarship to Maud Goslin, and the scholarship for Externs (or pupils of the Music School only), to Hester Snellgrove. In the Harmony and Theory Classes, a certificate of excellence and a prize has been awarded to Mary Elizabeth Pittman in the senior, and to Margerie Anstie in the junior class, Church of England High School for Girls.

An excellent rendering of Prout's dramatic Cantata "Alfred," followed by a miscellaneous selection was given by the North East London Choral Society, at Morley Hall, Hackney, on the 13th ult. The principal vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Rose Dafforne, R.A.M., Mr. Selwyn Graham, and Mr. James Bayne; solo violoncello, Mr. Allen Gill; harmonium, Mr. E. Prout, B.A., planoforte, Mr. Louis B. Prout, R.A.M.; Conductor, Mr. John E. West, F.C.O. All the artists acquitted themselves admirably, and the choir gave evidence of careful and musicianly training.

The Eighth Season of the Lavender Hill Choral Society, was brought to a close with a Concert at the Shaftesbury Hall on the 12th ult., Bennett's "May Queen" was the principal feature in the programme, the soloists being Miss Amy Denning, Miss Stammers, Mr. Walter Thurgood, and Mr. J. Ortner. The choruses were well rendered by a large choir, as were also the part-songs "Come let us all a maying go," and "The Vikings," the latter receiving a well merited encore. Mr. J. R. Jekyll conducted, and Miss Bird, Miss Hoar, and Mr. G. Winney were the accompanists.

MR. J. S. CURWEN, president of the Tonic Sol-fa College, has just returned from Italy and Switzerland, where he has been studying popular music in all its phases. At Turin and Milan he spent some time in visiting schools, normal colleges, and choral societies, directing his attention especially to the causes of the richness of the Italian voices. At Zurich he visited schools of all grades, from the kindergartens upwards, attended rehearsals of choirs, and studied the organisation of the municipal school of music. Mr. Curwen will publish a report of his tour.

THE members of St. Stephen's Choir, North Bow, presented, on the 5th ult., an elegant silver tea and coffee service to Mr. Edward Stroud, on his relinquishing the post of Honorary Choirmaster, after seven years' service. The Vicar of the parish, the Rev. F. R. Lawrence, who was in the chair, spoke in very high terms of Mr. Stroud's successful and diligent labours, and the recipient of the testimonial expressed in suitable words his thanks for the gift and also his regret at leaving his friends. Mr. E. Price, the Organist, has accepted the vacant post.

A PERFORMANCE of Handel's "Messiah" was given at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, on Tuesday evening, April 28. The artists were Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Damian, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The band and chorus, numbering 200 performers, were selected from the Crystal Palace Orchestra, the Royal Albert Hall, Sacred Harmonic, and other choral societies, together with the Christ Church choir and friends. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ, and Mr. J. R. Griffiths conducted.

On Friday, the 15th ult., a Concert was given at the Highbury Athenæum, under the able conductorship of Miss Berrie Stephens, R.A.M., the principal of the Highbury and Islington Organ School and College of Music. The first part of the programme comprised vocal selections from the oratorios, pianoforte solos and duets, &c., the second part being occupied by Van Bree's Cantata "St. Cecilia's Day." The music was excellently rendered.

MR. CARL WEBER'S second annual Concert took place on the 15th ult. at Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, on which occasion an interesting programme, for the lovers of music pur et simple, had been provided, including pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Moszkowski, and others. The Concert-giver was assisted by Miss Ida Weber (violin) and Miss Hilda Wilson (vocalist).

AT St. Olave's, Southwark, on Ascension Day, after a shortened form of Evening Service, Parts II. and III. of Gounod's "Redemption" were excellently performed by a choir of 70 voices, under the direction of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. W. Taylor. Madame Bessie Webber ably sustained the principal soprano part, associated with her in the trios being Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Trotman. Messrs. Cornwall and Milsom undertook the Narrators' parts, and Mr. G. Trotman sang the whole of the bass music.

On Wednesday, the 13th ult., a Concert was given in the Town Hall, Wandsworth, in aid of the Home for Indigent Blind. The following artists kindly gave their services:—Mrs. J. West, Miss Lilian Greville, Miss Mattie Hart, Messrs. J. S. Moncur, H. Atkinson, Jabez West, Dr. Phipson, and Mr. Roger Ascham. The violin playing of Dr. Phipson was the feature of the evening. Mr. Ascham a young pianist of marked ability, played Liszt's "Faust Waltz" with much success.

At the Third Meeting of the Artists' and Amateurs' Society, at Princes' Hall, on Tuesday, April 28, the solo vocalists were Miss Alexandra Ehrenberg, and Mr. Horscroft. The choristers of the Temple Church sang trios by Mendelssohn, Smart, and Roberti, and Callcott's old Catch "Have you read Sir John Hawkins's History." Mr. Henry Smith played Verroust's Third Concert Solo in F for oboe, and Schubert's Serenade. Accompanist, Mr. C. W. Perkins; Conductor, Mr. Avalon Collard.

MDLLE. IDA HENRY'S Annual Concert took place at the Princes' Hall on the 22nd ult, when she was assisted by Miss Louise Philips, Madame Isabel Fassett, and Mr. J. Robertson (vocalists), and Herr Ludwig Straus (solo violin). The Concert-giver played, with much success, solos by Liszt, Bach, Mendelssohn, Chopin, &c., and in conjunction with Herr Straus, a Sonata by Dvorák and a Duet by F. Kiel. Mr. Robertson's songs were given in very acceptable style.

A PERFORMANCE of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," was given on the 19th ult. at Highbury, under the båton of Mr. Keynes, which, in view of the difficulties of the work, reflected the utmost credit on all concerned. The chorus had been thoroughly trained, and sang with unflagging spirit throughout. Mrs. Hutchinson, in the part of the Sulamite, and Miss Marian McKenzie in the contralto music, especially in "Lo, the King," were very successful; and Mr. W. Nicholl and Mr. Forington created a most favourable impression by their finished rendering of the music allotted to them.

THE gentlemen of the choir of All Saints', Clapton, gave their fifth Evening Concert in the schools, Blurton Road, Clapton, on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. M. Wait, Organist and Choirmaster. Miss Kate Fusselle and Miss Ellen Marchant were the lady vocalists, the members of the choir contributing the other vocal items. Mr. G. S. Young played a pianoforte solo by Schumann, and Mr. Henry Lewis a violin solo.

A SPECIAL Choral Evensong was held at St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, on the 13th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and "Hear my Prayer" were sung in place of the anthem. The soloists were Miss Florence Davis, Miss Mary Morgan, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. Henry Baker. The choruses were excellently rendered by an augmented choir. Mr. C. T. Corke presided at the organ, and Mr. Edmund Rogers conducted.

THE South London Musical Club, under the direction of Mr. C. Stevens, gave a performance of Gadsby's Cantata, "Columbus," on the 19th ult., at Gresham Hall, Brixton. The tenor part was taken by Mr. Harper Kearton, and the accompaniment was played by the composer. The second part consisted of glees and solos, the latter being given by Messrs. E. G. Richardson, G. Hunt, Spurling, and C. Pompe.

Two performances of a new Choral Ballad by Rheinberger, entitled "Clarice of Eberstein," together with selections from Max Brüch's "Lay of the Bell," and Hiller's "Lurline," were given by Miss Holland's Choir, at the Westminster Town Hail on the 12th and 14th ult. Mesdames D'Arbour and Giovanna Ameris, Mr. Deris Hart, and Mr. O. E. Thomas, took part in the proceedings.

HERR Koch gave his fourth annual Pianoforte Recital at the Northfield Hall, Highgate, on April 30, when his playing of some of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," and Chopin's Scherzo in C sharp minor Op. 39), was especially appreciated. Several compositions of the Concert-giver were well received, the success of the evening being "Zuleikha," which was admirably sung by Mr. Joseph Gostic. The other vocalists were Miss Marian Joseph Gostic. Ellis and Mr. C. Copland.

THE fourth annual Pianoforte Recital of Mr. Charlton T. Speer was given at Princes' Hall on the 20th ult. when a programme of a varied, but chiefly modern complexion was provided. Mrs. Brereton and Mr. Abercrombie assisted with vocal contributions. The proceeds of the Concert are to be devoted to the projected scholarship in memory of the late Madame Sainton-Dolby at the Royal Academy of Music.

A CONCERT, comprising gems from the Oratorios, was given at the Limehouse Town Hall on the 12th ult., in aid of the redecoration of Christ Church, Stepney. The principal artists were Miss Chausey, R.A.M., Miss Hill, Mr. J. Olive, Mr. T. W. Speller, and Mr. S. Penniall, all of whom received well-merited applause. The choir, augmented by a string band, was under the able conductorship of Mr. S. T. Hill, Organist of the above-named church.

Mr. REGINALD GROOME gave his fifth annual Concert, at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on April 28, assisted by Miss Marianne Fenna, Miss Effic Clements, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Franklin Clive, Mr. Jas. Bayne, and Mr. Seymour Smith, vocalists; solo violin, Miss Adelina Dinelli; solo pianoforte, Mr. Edwin Samson; Conductor, Mr. W. H. Thomas. The hall was crowded, and the Concert was in every respect a great success.

THE Toronto Philharmonic Society, under the able direction of Mr. F. H. Torrington, has had a highly successful season; several important compositions having been included in the programmes. Next season will be produced Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and Gounod's "Mors et Vita," which is to be heard for the first time at the approaching Birmingham Festival. Both these works will be given with full band and chorus.

THE second number of "The Quarterly Musical Review," edited by Dr. Hiles, and published at Manchester, contains some really excellent articles which we cordially commend to the attention of all music-lovers. "Some practical difficulties in Music Teaching," by F. Corder, "The State and Musical Art," by Arthur F. Smith, Mus. B., and two papers by the Editor, are well written, and contain several important suggestions.

Mr. Sinclair Dunn gave his fifth annual Concert on Tuesday afternoon, the 5th ult., at Collard and Collard's Rooms, Grosvenor Street. Mr. Dunn was assisted by Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Berta Foresta, Miss Susetta Fenn, Mr. Vaughan Edwards, and Mr. Frederic King, vocalists; and Herr J. H. Bonawitz, pianoforte. Madame Hersee received several encores, and Mr. Dunn was warmly

On Thursday evening, the 21st ult., an Opera composed by Mr. J. W. Wilson, and entitled "Donna Théresa," performed in the large hall of the Church Institute, Wandsworth Common. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra under the direction of the composer. The soloists and chorus were efficient, and the performance (which was in aid of the building fund of St. Mary Magdalene) was generally successful.

A NEW Pulpit has recently been presented to St. Andrew's Church, Stoke Newington, by Mr. C. J. C. Boddington, the Organist. It is a very handsome structure of Maltese Stone, and made from the design of A. W. Blomfield, Esq., the architect of the church. The Dedication ceremony was conducted by the Rev. H. E. J. Bevan, M.A., vicar.

THE last Organ Recital of the season was given on the and ult, at the Bow and Bromley Institute by Dr. Peace, of Glasgow, the vocalist being Miss Alice Fripp. Dr. Peace was highly successful in the rendering of all his pieces, the Toccata con Fuga, C minor (Bach) being who understand German to the original for fuller details especially appreciated.

MR. DAVID WOODHOUSE, Organist of All Saints, Pimlico, gave an interesting Organ Recital at All Saints' Church, South Acton, on the 6th ult., in aid of the Organ Improvement Fund. The programme, which was rendered in a masterly manner, included compositions by Handel, Mendelssohn, Rossini, and Smart.

Mr. Humphrey J. Stark's Cantata "The Rival Seasons" was performed by the pupils of Archbishop Tenison's School, Leicester Square, on the 18th ult. Mr. Walter E. Stark presided at the pianoforte, Mr. F. G. Cole, L. Mus. T.C.L., at the harmonium, and the composer conducted.

Mr. J. C. Bridge, M.A., B. Mus., Exeter College, Organist of Chester Cathedral, was, on Friday, the 22nd ult., presented to the Vice-Chancellor by Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Professor of Music, and was admitted to the Degree of Doctor in Music of the University of Oxford.

In our note on the Glee-singing at the Criterion in last month's issue, we described the boys as "practically raw material in last December." This statement, as a correspondent has pointed out, admits of correction, several of their number having previously sung in church choirs.

WE hear that Her Majesty the Queen has graciously accepted the dedication of an Album of some twenty songs, composed by Sir Herbert Oakeley, which will shortly be published.

MR. OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT has resigned the post of Musical Director of the Bach Choir, held by him since its foundation in 1876, and will be succeeded next season by Dr. C. Villiers Stanford.

WE are informed that Madame Helen Hopekirk has been invited to play in Washington before President Cleveland, in conjunction with Miss Emma Thursby, on the 7th inst.

A CHORAL Festival will be held at St. Augustine and St. Faith's Church, Watling Street, E.C., on Tuesday evening, the 2nd inst., commencing at 7.30, at which Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be sung.

It is announced that the Bishop of London has consented to become a patron of the London Church Choir Association.

Mr. W. DE M. SERGISON will give his annual Organ Recitals at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, on the Wednesdays in June, at 6 p.m.

MR. F. S. ORAM has recently been appointed Conductor to the Tottenham Musical Society.

REVIEWS.

Studien zur Geschichte der Französischen Musik. Von H. M. Schletterer. Part III. [Berlin: R. Damköhler.]

THE first two parts of Dr. Schletterer's valuable studies on the History of French Music were reviewed in these columns about a year ago; we have now before us the third part, which fully rises to the same level of merit as those previously issued. The sub-title of the portion now to be noticed is "Vorgeschichte, und Erste Versuche der Französischen Oper"—the preliminary history and first attempts at the French opera. As the present volume carries the history no later than the close of the seventeenth century, it will readily be understood that its interest is to a large extent antiquarian. We do not intend by this to imply that the book is dry reading; such, indeed, is far from being the case; but that it deals with matters with which it is perhaps hardly too much to say that the majority of musical readers feel little sympathy.

The large amount of information, often of a very curious character, condensed into a comparatively small space by Dr. Schletterer renders it more than ordinarily difficult to give an adequate idea of his work in a review. There are so many points equally worthy of notice or quotation that one hardly knows what to take and what to omit. We must content ourselves now with a short epitome of the contents of the volume, and refer those of our readers as to the subjects treated.

Dr. Schletterer begins his work by showing that, as with the ancient Greeks, so with modern nations, the drama was the direct offspring of religion. The earliest dramatic representations of the Middle Ages were unquestionably the "Mysteries," represented in the churches on the occasion of high festivals, such as Christmas and Easter. As the secular element was gradually introduced into the performances they were given in the palaces of princes and the castles of nobles. Our author mentions it as one of the peculiarities of French dramatic performances that from the first admission was mostly paid for. The earliest plays, or at least the earliest which have come down to us, were exclusively written by the clergy, who were also the performers, stage-managers, and theatrical directors; they were all written on sacred subjects, and performed in the churches. The strong family likeness to be found in most of them doubtless arises, as Dr. Schletterer surmises, from the fact that a piece which had obtained popularity in one place would soon be heard of and imitated in another. It is curious to find that dancing was an essential part of these performances, and that this ancient custom, at first a religious act, continued to prevail in many cathedrals of France till the time of the revolution. and (according to our author) is still practised in many churches in Spain. Dr. Schletterer quotes an old couplet, which was sung at Limoges as late as the 17th century, on the feast of the patron saint :-

Saint Martial, priez pour nous, Et nous, nous danserons pour vous.

The earliest known mystery in France, which was written between the tenth and twelfth centuries-its exact date cannot be ascertained—came from the library of the Abbey of St. Martial, at Limoges. It is in three sections, the first being a dramatic version of the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, the second a representation of the Nativity, and the third of the Resurrection. Dr. Schletterer gives an interesting description of this work. More amusing, however, is the account which follows of the religious (?) celebration at the church of St. Etienne, in Beauvais, of the feast of the Flight of the Holy Family :-

"The fairest and most virtuous of the young maidens of the town was chosen for this solemn religious ceremony; they set her on an ass, put a child in her arms, and led her up to the high altar of the church with songs and dances, and the often repeated refrain of 'Hee, haw!' Even the officiating priest did homage to the day by reading a comic epistle, and concluding the mass with a thrice repeated 'Hee, haw!' instead of the usual 'Ite, missa est.' This festival soon found general imitation."

Dr. Schletterer adds that the church had the greatest difficulty in suppressing the festival, which was disgraced by the worst excesses both of clergy and laity.

Want of space forbids our doing more than refer to the extremely curious account of the old drama "Le Jeu d'Adam," dating from the 12th century, a singular medley of drama, liturgical songs, and pantomimic dances, the old manuscript of which was found in the library at Tours. full analysis of this remarkable production is given in the book, and will be read both with interest and amusement.

Among the poet-musicians of this time Adam de la Hale takes the foremost place. Dr. Schletterer says that not without reason the title of "founder of the comic opera," has been given to the old troubadour, though his musical dramas contained merely the germ of the modern forms. His "Robin et Marion" is a combination of spoken dialogue and music, on a secular subject simple and unaffected in its treatment. The music is described by our author as being graceful, light, attractive, and even expressive, while the feeling for modern tonality frequently shows itself. The popularity of this and similar secular pieces ultimately brought the downfall and final extinction of the religious drama. The "Moralités" which were very popular in the 14th century may be regarded as the intermediate stage. These were mostly performed by members of the Guild, known as "les Cleres de la Basoche," at Paris. This body had a king of its own, a fully organised court, and a regular constitution. In the "Moralités" which they performed, the characters instead of being Biblical were Allegorical. In the long list given by Dr. Schletterer we find not only such personages as Faith, Force, Humility, Bravery, Tenderness, Modesty, Lust,

Rebellion, and Folly, but such curious names as Welltaught and Badly-taught, Good-End and Bad-End, Great-Expense and Small-Income, Hope-for-long-life, Despairof-divine-grace, and others hardly less singular. Besides the "Moralités," the Guild also performed "soties" and "farces," the former name being applied to a species of "Moralités" treated satirically, while the latter were merely pieces full of broad fun, often remarkable chiefly for their astounding indecency.

After a notice of Emilis Cavaliere, the inventor of the oratorio, and the first to write solos with instrumental accompaniment, our author deals with Caccini and Peri, the first composers of opera as that word is now understood An account of the "Dafne" of the former, and "Euridice" of the latter writer is given. It will be seen that this section of the volume is only indirectly connected with French opera, as both the composers named were Italians: but some notice of them is of course necessary, as the Italian music exerted considerable influence on the French art. Claudio Monteverde, the greatest musician of his age, receives a due amount of attention. He was the first to understand the true principles of dramatic construction; it was he, too, who first regularly used the modern major and minor modes instead of the old church modes. In the development of dramatic music the Ballet took an important share, and a considerable section of this book is devoted to the description of the chief Ballets of the 16th and 17th centuries. Of these one of the most remarkable was that known as the "Ballet Comique de la Royné," composed and arranged by the Italian violinist, Baltazarini. This clever musician was sent with his band of violinists by the Governor of Piedmont to the Queen of France in 1566, and by his talents secured such favour at Court that he was entrusted with the management of all festivities, balls, concerts, and theatrical representations. reference to his orchestra Dr. Schletterer mentions in a note a fact giving us an idea of the primitive condition of violin playing at this time. Baltazarini's performers used instruments with five strings, tuned to A, D, G, C, and F obviously some of the older forms of viols. As the first string was tuned to F, the players were able with their little finger to reach the C in alt., which in France was regarded as something remarkable. It would seem to be implied by this that violinists at that time were ignorant of "shifting," and played only in the first position. On his appointment as "Maître des plaisirs" to the court Baltazarini took the name of M. de Beau-Joyeux (Beaujoyeulx). His masterpiece, the "Ballet Comique de la Royné" (the original title of which was "Le Ballet de Circé et de ses nymphes"), was produced in 1581 at the festivities arranged by King Henri III. on the occasion of the marriage of his favourite, the Duc de Joyeuse, with Marguerite de Lorraine. The ballet, which must, from our author's description, have been most gorgeous, was produced on Sunday, October 15, and the performance lasted from ten in the evening till half-past three in the morning. The full score of the work, illustrated with copper-plate engravings of the costumes, decorations, &c., was printed in the following year. Dr. Schletterer speaks of the music as being very remarkable for the age at which it was written, and adds that the work might well be entitled an opera. The orchestration is very interesting, and remarkable for its contrasts of tone colour. Besides strings-three violins, violas, and bassesthe score contains flutes, oboes, cromornes (a now obsolete wooden wind instrument), trumpets, horns, trombones, a harp, three lutes, a drum, an organ, and a Pan's pipe. These instruments were used not arbitrarily, but after a definite plan, and often with very happy effect.

We must pass with regret over many interesting details given of this and other ballets, as well as over the admirable remarks of our author on the influence of Italian upon French art during the 16th and 17th centuries, to say a few words on the concluding part of the volume, in which the reign of Louis XIV. is dealt with. It is curious that for a long period preceding the middle of the 17th century, France produced not one composer of renown; for all her music she was dependent upon foreigners. At length national vanity induced the French to try to cultivate the art for themselves; and the great Pierre Corneille was ordered by the court to write a drama in the Italian style.

The result was his "Andromedé," a spectacular drama, rather of science; it depends upon the perfecting of our which, though from a literary point of view the weakest of his works, was well enough adapted to its purpose, and which was performed for the first time in January, 1650, with great magnificence. "Andromèdé" is a play with incidental music and dances, rather than an opera; the first real opera librettist was Pierre Perrin, who was born at Lyons in 1620, and died in Paris in 1675. His curious matrimonial adventures are related by Dr. Schletterer (pp. 107-8), but are too long for quotation. Perrin is chiefly known from his association with the composer Cambert, one of the chief early French opera composers. The first opera theatre erected in Paris, situated in the Faubourg St. Germain, was opened with "Pomone," the libretto by Perrin, and the music by Cambert. The intrigues of Lully against Cambert, by which the latter was ultimately driven to England, are related in detail; and it will interest English readers to learn that it was at the suggestion of Cambert that Henry Purcell wrote his first English opera "Abelazor."

At this point Dr. Schletterer brings the third part of his history to a close. We have necessarily given a most incomplete and superficial account of the work; but we have probably said enough to induce some of our readers to examine it for themselves.

Origines et variations de notre Tonalité Son Avenir. Étude théorique and historique mise à la portée de tous. Par L. Pagnerre. [Paris: E. Dentu. 1885.]

THE title of this work, by M. Pagnerre, is exceedingly long and comprehensive. The work itself is a small octavo of 139 pages of large print, and very broad margins. It is in fact a short preface to a promised larger work, the materials for which the author tells us he has already collected. To those whose interest in music extends beyond the pleasures of sensation, there are few subjects more attractive than the origin of the modern tonality, the changes which, what we understand generally by tonality, it has undergone in a remote past, and above all, its possible changes in the immediate future. In spite of all that has been written on the subject by very learned men, it may be said that even now there is no musical question so little understood as tonality. Practitioners treat it, pedagogically as an affair of key, major or minor, in the modern sense, and as a matter of "leading notes" and "dominant sevenths," and so on; whilst scientific men and arithmetically-minded musicians respectively refer the question to physical and mathematical laws. Many technical theorists from Fétis, and before his time, to Mr. Gerard F. Cobb, of Trinity College, Cambridge, who quite lately read before the Musical Association a paper on certain features in the modern teaching of harmony, have founded their theories on what they call the "principle of tonality." All musicians, as well as all men of science who have attacked musical subjects, admit the importance of the principle; but either from the various methods of applying the principle, or from the fact that being complex, it embraces physical, psychical, and technical elements, its nature and operation have not yet been strictly determined. We are bound to say that M. Pagnerre's historical sketch, clearly put and excellent as it is, affords us no higher or newer point of view that would excuse a more lengthy and critical notice of his work than we intend to give. His readers will naturally be attracted by the words "Tonality and its future," which appear on the title-page. Musicians, who think more of the music and of musical deities than of theory, are not disposed to imagine that a tonality sanctified by Mozart and Beethoven has any new future or can ever change; and, as M. Pagnerre reminds us, in all successive ages the opinion has prevailed that the music of the past has only led up to the music of the present, and at each particular epoch it has been thought that the art had arrived at perfection and would henceforward decline. It must be acknowledged that this opinion has ultimately been confirmed in the history of sculpture, painting, and architecture, but so far it has not proved true in regard to "The music of the future," says M. Pagnerre, "has latterly been much discussed. No one can form a conception of it, for it is amongst the secrets of the gods, or tonality."

This quotation is from a few prefatory sentences, in which the author tells us that the object in writing his essay was to show that tonality is changeable and perfectable, and that our scale is not a final arrangement. We cannot attempt to follow M. Pagnerre in passing under review the history of musical scales from "Pelops to Wagner," but we may say that much old matter in which well-known landmarks such as tetrachords, church tones, neumes, clefs, descant, Monteverde, &c., re-appear, is briefly but well treated, and the explanations of M. Pagnerre are relieved by comments indicating sound sense and cultivation. From the style and method adopted in this introductory work, we should say that M. Pagnerre is a great reader, and is still collecting materials not yet kneaded, thought out, or put into shape. We fail to gather in his work any tangible opinion in regard to the principle of tonality. He tells us indeed, that "harmony depends on the scale," and that the fusion of the ancient modes did not altogether arise from the growth of harmonic combinations in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

That is not the ordinary view, but we think it is confirmed by the fact that it is not only the moderns who have limited the number of modes. The Greeks themselves virtually and practically limited them to three—the Lydian, Phrygian, and Dorian; and this limitation is simply a question of three normal forms or species of tetrachord, which in other modes are only repeated and differently joined together. When we come to the present day, and to that arch-fiend of modern times, the pianoforte, M. Pagnerre's ideas seem to us to fluctuate between the omnitonism of Fétis, the practical initiation of which M. Pagnerre attributes to Mozart, and a division of the scale something similar to that of the Indian scale of twenty-two scroutis. He confesses at the same time that Oriental nations are adopting the music of Western Europe; and leads us to infer that at Pekin, Teheran, Calcutta, Algiers, Egypt, and Tunis, the Chinese, Persian, Indian, and Arab divisions of the scale which have existed as they are now for centuries, and perhaps some of them for thousands of years, are yielding to the behests of French, English, or German bandmasters. In regard to the "future," we gather dimly from M. Pagnerre's causeries on the subject that the world is soon to be released from the tyranny of pianos and bandmasters; and that as for Wagner he was by no means an innovator. He only exaggerated, says M. Pagnerre, the methods, style, and ideas already existing. His music is the music of the present. He wrote in the tonality of preceding and contemporary composers. The harmonic combinations he employed were the same as theirs, and only a little more complicated by the use of auxiliary sounds such as retardations, chromatic alterations, appoggiaturas, &c. His dissonances were not bolder than those of Bach and Beethoven, admitting that Wagner himself excelled in the art of "leading" the dissonances. What belongs specially to Wagner is the device of systematically "and with an ever-increasing obstinacy," all but annihilating unity of tonic relation. "At one bound he has shot past his predecessors," says our author, "and rightly or wrongly has entered the path opened by Mozart, that is to say, the omnitonic order, which chronologically followed the pluritonic order.

All this, from a merely technical point of view, is rigidly correct; but it has nothing to do with the dramatic ethos of Wagner's music for which, we imagine, M. Pagnerre, judging from his calm style and classic predilections, has no enthusiastic admiration. It is an eternal question, whether a great composer initiates or closes a period. It occurred in the case of Mozart, and is still a question in regard to Verdi, "the last of the Romans," as the founder of his school, Rossini, has called him.

It would be quite reasonable to maintain that Wagner has rather closed the Beethovenian period than inaugurated a new school; and that nothing can now proceed from the Nibelungen tetralogy but more or less grotesque imitations. The undoubted pause in the stream of German inspiration at this moment rather points to that view.

M. Pagnerre's treatment of the theories of Helmholtz, to whom, as a man of science, he does full justice, seems, like his opinions on Wagner, to be affected by that common indisposition to wholly resign previous acquirements and prejudices, even when we are anxious to separate ourselves from a vulgar conservatism. M. Pagnerre has, perhaps, lived sometime in the world, and in a particular part of it, and in the course of his lifetime may have accumulated a variety of lore from French, or, at least, familiar sources. He has written a learned book of travel in welltrodden regions, without stirring from his arm-chair. It is therefore not surprising that, without the slightest hesitation, he should inform us that Handel stole the melody of "God save the king" from Lulli. We have certainly heard the legend before; but M. Pagnerre's crude and positive manner of telling it might shock English anti-quaries. Still, we freely acknowledge that in his historical sketch of tonality, the incidental matter—whether it be church modes, the theory of Rameau, the Galin-Chevé system of notation, which he thinks fit only for popular singing-classes-or the subject of temperament, or passing criticisms on composers, are lightly but skilfully treated, without pedantry; and induce us to look forward with hope to his promised more complete treatise on Tonality, past, present, and future.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer. No. 25. Musical Expression. By M. Mathis Lussy. Translated from the fourth edition, with corrections and additions by the Author, by Miss M. E. von Glehn.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE have already reviewed, at some length, the French editions of more than one work by M. Lussy, and much of the subject matter of the treatise on "Musical Expression," we think, amongst the rest. Its appearance in Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s series of Primers will be a great boon to many of our readers. The examples in music are beautifully printed, and the translation by Miss von Glehn is excellent. To musicians, the book has been well known for years past; but there must be a large portion of the music-loving and music-studying public to whom a great deal that M. Lussy has to impart on the value even of "marks of expression" in the notation of music, will amount almost to a revelation. His work is the only one of the kind. The happy idea occurred to him more than twenty years ago, whilst commencing the difficult and responsible duties of tuition, that what we are too often pleased to pass over as the unteachable power of performing on musical instruments with expression, must have a solid foundation in emotions and sensations, that are in themselves facts, subject to analysis, and their manifestations capable of being graphically represented. One great advantage in the method adopted by M. Lussy is that it does not consist in inventing new signs, but in the philosophic explanation and use of those already employed by composers—when they do employ them, it being one of the complainings of M. Lussy that composers grossly neglect the marks of expression at their command. On the other hand, performers, either from indolence or want of careful instruction in this branch of the art, not only do not attend to the composers' indications, but do not fully understand their meaning. There is not one amateur pianist in a hundred who knows what a "slur" signifies. It is supposed to mean that something or other is to be played more or less legato; but few have any conception how that familiar mark of expression, in point of phrasing, enters into the delicate and abstruse subject of rhythm. The question is often asked in an ordinary drawing-room-"How is it that no one can possibly dance to Mr. So-and-So's playing? and he is such a great musician." M. Lussy would answer in this way:—To the dancer, music is an affair only of metrical accent, representing the merest instinct and lowest form of the art. To the cultivated musician, music is not a question of bars, or of beats of the foot, but of long phrases, often varied in length, and determined by rhythmical accent, something similar to punctuation in language, but far less precise in notation, whilst it is far more exacting in regard to the sense of the periods and sections. "It is this frequent omission," says M. Lussy, "of the metrical accent which gives to many modern waltzes such an ethereal feeling. To musicians we have underlined the word "time," because the dancer's opinion is that it is he or she who has the idea of "time, whilst it is the musician, who makes a muddle of the polka, who has none. Time in music is a question of speed, and also of rhythm in the true sense of the word, for which the best analogue is symmetry, as opposed to regularity, and not incompatible with those variations of Their sympathies tempo so embarrassing to dancers. usually incline towards the synchronous revolutions of a handle. And, indeed, musicians themselves, as M. Lussy remarks, are, in regard to tempo, still divided into twoschools of executants-the cold and accurate and the irregular and emotional. According to the views of M. Lussy, and his categorical division of the subject, the metrical accent must give way to the rhythmical, the rhythmical to the expressive accent, whilst all in the end vield to the "emotional element." In his book M. Lussy follows these several divisions in turn; and the most sceptical in regard to the possibility of teaching by rule an expressive style of playing, if only convinced against his will, may learn at least a great deal he never knew before from M. Lussy's annotated examples. As for the general musical reader, we can only repeat that this long accepted work is to him a mine of interest and instruction. M. Lussy's indications are not confined to "marks of expression." He tells us when and where an isolated note, a syncopation, a certain melodic passage, and even a chromatic chord or interval calls for specific accentuation. He also enters the realm of tonality as an element. in emotional expression, which it certainly is. know the enthusiasm with which M. Lussy is inspired by that marvellous growth we call the "staff notation." It may be his enthusiasm is that of a pedagogue only, but at a time when so many are working at simplifications of the system—simplifications which, as far as the staff notation itself is concerned, have not yet come to much—we cannot refrain from closing this short notice of M. Lussy's book by a quotation he gives in a note himself, from his own "Histoire de la Notation Musicale." He says-" It is evident that the exceptional must be distinguished from the normal. Musical notation depicts what is exceptional in an admirable manner. Nothing can escape the experienced eye; neither the short or long notes nor their ascending or descending, parallel or contrary motion, the multiplicity of the different parts, the interruption of the sequences, the wideness of the intervals, the destruction of the key or mode by the occurrence of accidentals, &c. It is only the augmented fourth, F to B natural, and the diminished fifth, B natural to F, which are not well depicted. The other augmented or diminished intervals are the consequence of the preceding note, admirably characterised by the presence of a sharp or flat." M. Lussy obviously revels in sharps and flats, and it seems a pity they should run the risk of being disturbed by simplifying inventors.

Richard Wagner. Personal Recollections. By August Lesimple. Translated from the German hy Carl Armbruster. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

To the credit of the author of this little book, it must be said that his admiration for the great musical reformer of whom he records his recollections has not blinded him to his defects, although such defects, it is evident, were merely those arising from that irritability almost inseparable from the real artistic nature. "Not one of Wagner's friends," says Herr Lesimple, "will ever forget any hour spent in his company. For this reason, publications however modest in tenor and extent, if furnished by his friends, will, according to my opinion, form the only valuable materials to enable the future biographer of the deceased master to form a correct and unprejudiced estimate of his private character and domestic life. sincerely hope that such materials will be consulted by all who attempt to write the life of this remarkable man; for it is only recently that a light has been thrown upon the true character of Beethoven; the many who encountered him but in his irascible moments, having in their haste to record something of the great composer from their own experience, represented him to us as little better than an these waltzes are fascinating, though people who have little inspired savage. As an antidote, therefore, to the harm feeling for time think them detestable." In this quotation which might arise from a perpetuation of the impression of Wagner's characteristics derived from a perusal of the writings of those violently opposed to his doctrines, we cordially commend Herr Lesimple's "Recollections"; for, although a warm friend and professed adherent of the composer's advanced theories, the book, as we have already said, sufficiently proves that its author has no desire to gloss over those peculiarities of temperament which he rightly fears have hitherto been greatly exaggerated by comparative strangers and artistic enemies.

Deserted (Poveretta). Song. Words by Leopoldo Marenco.

Nenuphars (The Song of the Opium-eater). Eastern Song; words by A. Renaud.

The Weary Spinner (La Filatrice). Song. Words from the Italian of Capranica.

Parting (Partenza); Tuscan Folk Song. Words from Tigri's Collection.

Invocation to Slumber. Love-song. Words by L. Rocca.

Composed by Philip Marchetti.

[Milan: F. Lucca. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is long since we have received a group of songs so fresh, melodious, and truly artistic in treatment as these by Signor Marchetti, who, although we confess unknown to us, can scarcely be long in making his way to the sympathies of all who love pure and unpretentious vocal music. "Deserted" has an attractive theme, charmingly accompanied; "Nenuphars" is just such a song, both in the voice and instrumental parts, as we might imagine to pass through the brain of an opium-eater; "The Weary Spinner," with its monotonous accompaniment in thirds on the oft repeated harmony of A minor, is almost painfully expressive of the words; "Parting" has an attractive theme, with a marked figure for the pianoforte throughout; "One tiny Kiss" is an effective setting of a brief and pleasing poem; and the "Invocation to Slumber" has a simple pathos in every note which faithfully reflects the words, and must make itself felt by every sensitive hearer. The warmest praise is due to Mr. Theo. Marzials for his able translation of all these songs, the beautiful poetry of many, indeed, materially aiding any composer in his task; and we may fairly congratulate Signor Marchetti, not only upon the success of his music, but upon the excellent taste he has displayed in the selection of his words.

The Harmonium: how to use it. By J. C. Grieve. [Edinburgh: Ernest Köhler and Son.]

THE author of this treatise says, in his preface, "I have tried to conduct the pupil, step by step, through the different stages of harmonium-playing, laying down rules for his guidance on every essential point, explaining minutely the nature and object of these rules, so that the pupil may come to understand for himself when and how to apply them." We are bound to say that this plan is most successfully carried out; and that apart from the excellent laws given for those who study the harmonium, the elementary part of music itself is more clearly explained than we generally find in instrumental instruction-books. We could wish that the pupil had been taught to couple the tonic, instead of the relative, minor with each major key; but we presume that the author did not desire to be innovative, and we must at least give him credit for exhibiting the varied forms of the minor scale. To all who wish to make solid progress on the harmonium we cordially commend Mr. Grieve's Tutor; for it not only contains the result of wide experience, but this result is, throughout the work, plainly and intelligently stated.

Album of Songs. Second series. Composed by Frederic W. Clarke, Mus. Bac., Oxon. Compiled and edited by his friends, Rev. W. Mann (Precentor of Bristol Cathedral), and Charles South, Esq. (Organist of Salisbury Cathedral). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This Album of ten songs is published "To the Memory of their Author"; and in the Preface the compilers of the work say, "There is little doubt that if this clever and enthusiastic artist had lived, he would have earned for world." Many of his songs are already well known; and certainly, judging from these and his planoforte pieces, we of thee," the best we have yet seen from his pen, and its can fully endorse the opinion we have quoted, even were it reception by vocalists will test their power to separate not strengthened by the collection now before us. There is a simple beauty and an artistic feeling characterising the whole of the compositions contained in this volume which cannot but recommend them to lovers of eloquent vocal music. No. 1, "I wandered by the brookside," is a sympathetic setting of some charming lines by Milnes; and were we to name our other especial favourites we should point to No. 4, "A Match" (Swinburne), and No. 7, "A Dreamer's Song" (Barry Cornwall); but, as we have said, all the songs are certain to win the earnest attention of a musical audience. We are told that Mr. Clarke, who died at the early age of 31, was almost entirely self-taught, both in the theory and practice of his art. To those who knew him best his untimely decease was a sincere shock; and the issue of the volume "In Memoriam" is a graceful tribute to his worth, both as an artist and a friend.

Nehemiah. An Oratorio. The text selected and compiled from the Scriptures, and in part written by A. J. Foxwell. The music composed by Josiah Booth.

[J. Curwen and Sons.]

IT cannot be said that there is any striking or original thought in this work-which is evidently intended for unambitious choral Societies-but the Oratorio throughout is musicianly, and might appeal with success to a miscellaneous audience. Although unquestionably the main strength of the composition lies in the choral pieces, many of the solos are not only extremely melodious, but thoroughly sympathetic with the text, amongst which may be cited the air in the second part, "There is a river, for mezzo-soprano, which is really attractive enough to take its place apart from the work in which it appears. When sung with a pianoforte accompaniment only, however, the flute part, which occasionally occurs, ought to be played by the pianist; but we presume that the C, in the fourth bar of page 77, should be D. The libretto, which narrates the rebuilding of Jerusalem, is well compiled, some original matter, by Mr. A. J. Foxwell, being skilfully added to the Scriptural text. As the Oratorio is divided into three parts, and choruses predominate, it is difficult to name all those which would form especial features in a performance of the work; but the opening piece, "Weep, Israel," and the last chorus of the second part, "O sing unto the Lord," may be mentioned as containing some effective points, although in no place can we say that the composer has soared into the higher regions of sacred writing.

Arrangements for the Organ. By W. J. Westbrook, Mus. Doc., Cantab. [London Music Publishing Company].

Dr. Westbrook has made a name for himself as a transcriber for the organ, and the twelve books of arrangements before us therefore need no preliminary commendation in order to bring them under the notice of organists. It is not the editor's fault that the field is practically exhausted so far as the great masters are concerned. All the most likely movements from their works having been arranged and re-arranged, some of them many times over. Dr. Westbrook gives us three of Bach's forty-eight fugues, which were much used by organists in the old days, when the legitimate organ music of the composer was unknown. He has also drawn upon Corelli, giving us the Eighth Concerto in G minor, and the Sixth Violin Sonata in A, each of these occupying the whole of a book. Various minor pieces, by Beethoven, Arne, Dussek, Hummel, Spohr, Haydn, Schumann, Scarlatti, and Mendelssohn, are included in the series, and it is almost needless to add that the transcriptions have generally been made with taste and judgment.

Love's Legacy. Song. The words by Malcolm Charles Salaman. Music by Charles Salaman. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

WERE we to say that this song will fully sustain Mr. Salaman's reputation it would be no mean praise, for his many contributions to the vocal music of the day are amongst the most melodious, refined, and artistic of any composer in this country. "Love's Legacy," however, is, with the exception of his setting of "I arise from dreams good from bad. The figure, sustained throughout, in the accompaniment, adds much to the effect of a theme essentially vocal and sympathetic with the text, which is so far above the average of the conventional "words for music" as to claim a right to be heard on its own account. Amongst the many beauties of this composition we may mention the striking modulation from D to F major in the second page, and the highly poetical treatment of the concluding bars after the pause. Our copy of the song is in D, for tenor and soprano; and by being sent to us in this key, we suppose that its publication a minor third lower, for baritone and mezzo-soprano, scarcely represents the composer's intention. Presuming this to be the case, let us hope that the original idea will be respected as much as possible; for although good music must always be acceptable in any key, it cannot be denied that transposition thoroughly alters its character.

The Organ Library. Book VI. Edited by Walter Spinney. [Wood and Co.]

This is a serial of original organ compositions, each book containing four pieces. Of those in the one before us, none of which are of any great value, the most pleasing is a short March in G minor, by the editor.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E, for Double Choir, unaccompanied.

O taste and see, and O love the Lord. Anthems. By A. H. Mann. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE effect of voices unaccompanied is very impressive in a sacred building, and Dr. Mann's Evening Service ought to become popular in cathedrals and other places where the resources necessary for its execution are available. It should be remembered that a double choir is not the same thing as eight real parts. In great measure the decani and cantoris voices are employed antiphonally in this service, and the contrapuntal writing is modest, though broad and effective. The Anthems are simple enough for parish choirs, but are pleasing, and recall the chaste and dignified style of Goss.

Composed Six new Duets for Violin and Piano. especially for Amateurs by Angelo Costa. [F. Pitman.]

It is a sign of the healthy progress of music that compositions especially intended for amateurs should be original, instead of arranged from opera fragments which have been dinned into our ears from early childhood. The multiplication of such excellent pieces as those before us should be warmly encouraged; and we are glad to have an opportunity of commending them to the attention of those young violin students who, having passed through the instruction-book, are desirous of laying the foundation of a classical taste. Little, indeed, is attempted in any of the six duets contained in this collection; but there is scarcely one which is not really good of its kind and sufficiently melodious to give pleasure to a mixed audience. We may mention as our especial favourities No. 1, "Albumblatt," No. 3, "Abendlied," and No. 6, "Canzonetta," although all, as we have already said, have very decided

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G. Benedictus and Agnus Dei

By R. H. Turner. [Novello, Ewer and Co.].

Mr. Turner's evening Service may be warmly recommended to those who require a tuneful and easy setting in four-part harmony. It is at once musicianly, pleasing, and unpretentious. The same qualities characterise the communion pieces, which were composed for St. Paul's, Dundee, where Mr. Turner is Organist and Choirmaster.

O Salutaris, Agnus Dci (Op. 2). By Basil Harwood. Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE pieces have Latin words, and are, therefore, presumably intended for use in Roman Catholic churches. They are in simple four-part harmony and full throughout. Mr. Harwood's chromatic progressions occasionally savour of Spohr; but he has a curious fondness for avoiding a full close in any key save the tonic, and the want of relief makes the effect somewhat monotonous.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By William Taylor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.].

THE composer of this service is Organist of the parish church, Kidderminster, and he is evidently a talented and accomplished musician. His music is characterised by a flow of pleasing yet dignified melody, and rich church-like harmonies. The style is by no means complex or elaborate; but we venture to think that the composer would have been wise had he avoided repetitions of words, which prolong the service and reduce its chances of acceptance by organists and precentors.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE following enumeration of performances in commemoration of the recent bi-centenary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach, the recognised "father of the modern musical development" in the country of his birth, contrasts strangely, in its comparative insignificance, with that published in our last number concerning a similar tribute paid by his native country to the memory of George Frederick Handel. We again state the performances in alphabetical order, and with due reserve as to relative completeness,

BERLIN.—Bilse Concert (February 23): Ciaconna for orchestra (arranged by J. Raff).

Brunswick.—Schröder's Choir (March 20): Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, for organ, Motett "Jesu, meine Freude," Adagio and Dolce from third organ Sonata, choruses from several cantatas, and Cantata "Ein feste Burg."

Breslau.- Sing-Akademie (March 17): Kyrie and Christe Eleison, from Mass in B minor, selections from several Cantatas, and Magnificat in D major.

DRESDEN .- Conservatorium (March 23): Motett "Jesu, meine Freude"; Orchestral Suite No. 2; Cantata, "Schlage doch, gewünschte Stunde"; Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte, flute, and violin.

GLAUCHAU.—Kirchen-Sänger-Chor (March 22): Prelude and Fugue in G; Largo for violin and organ; Chorus from Cantata "Gottes Zeit"; and selections from "Passion Music."

HERRNHUT. — Gesang-Verein (March II): Cantata, "Gottes Zeit"; and Choruses from St. Matthew "Passion Music.'

Leipzig.—Riedelscher Gesang-Verein (March 6): Cantata "Gottes Zeit"; and Choruses from St. Matthew

" Passion Music."

The present season of the famous Orchestral Concerts under the direction of Herr Bilse, of Berlin (frequently alluded to in these columns), came to a close on April 30, the occasion being rendered special by the retirement of the Conductor from a post which he has occupied with so much credit to himself and advantage to the art for the last eighteen years. There was no lack of special recognition of the veteran Conductor's services, including a decoration conferred upon him by the German Emperor. The difficulty will be, now, to find a suitable successor in the generalship of a body of select artists whose performances have become a positive institution in the musical life of the German metropolis.

The music festival (already announced by us) to be held at Stuttgart, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th ult., under the patronage of the King of Wurtemberg, will include performances of Handel's Oratorio "Samson," Bach's Orchestral Suite, Schubert's Symphony in C, prelude to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," Pianoforte Concertos by Mozart and Schumann, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Brahms's "Schicksals-lied," and Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Choral Fantasia. Among the solo performers engaged are Madame Rosa Papier and Herr Gudehus, the chorus will consist of the forces of the Hof-Theater and several choral societies of Stuttgart and its vicinity. The festival is looked forward to with especial interest as being the first of its kind attempted in this part of Germany.

For the information of those amongst our readers who have entered the prize-competition for a valse, initiated by our Dresden contemporary Das Orchester, we may state that the result will not be published until the end of the present month. The delay has been granted in deference to representations made on the part chiefly of transatlantic competitors, the matter having evidently excited some little interest amongst musicians and musical aspirants generally. The jury will be composed of such competent judges in this particular sphere of the art as Herren Eduard Strauss, of Vienna; Capellmeister Mannsfeldt, of Dresden; and Music-Director Bohne, of Magdeburg.

Herr C. F. Pohl, the well-known author of the (as yet incomplete) excellent biography of Haydn, and valued librarian of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, has just published an interesting pamphlet commemorative of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the existence of this already

The rooth performance of Spohr's opera "Jessonda," took place on the 1st ult. at the Royal Opera house of Berlin. Spohr's most meritorious stage-work was first produced in 1823, and the above number of representations since that period is a relatively large one, considering that "Jessonda" has never been popular, in the sense for instance of Weber's "Freischütz" (brought out in 1821), whereof the 500th performance was recorded some few months since at the same leading operatic institution.

Victor Massé's posthumous opera "Une Nuit de Cléopatre" was produced for the first time at the Paris Opéra-Comique on April 25. The libretto, written by Jules Barbier upon the lines of a fanciful story by Théophile Gautier, deals with a brief amorous adventure (" une nuit," in fact) enacted between the courtesan queen and a humble fisherman, culminating in the latter's death, by poison, administered to him by order of the Royal enchantress upon the announcement of the return from a military campaign of Marc Antony. The subject presents scarcely enough of dramatic elements to fill three acts, but the work on the whole was nevertheless extremely well received. We extract the following from a very interesting account of the performance rendered by a correspondent of the Daily Telegraph—" Massé (when engaged upon the work) was already stricken with the disease from which he was to die. He went to Saint-Germains, and by a strange coincidence was working in one set of rooms at the Pavillon Henri Quatre, while Offenbach was in another, putting his finishing touches to the 'Contes d'Hoffmann,' an opera which its author was also destined never to see upon the stage. In fact, the two composers were dying at the same ring a similar risk. Thus, at the Teatro Carcano, of Milan, first hearing inclines me to think that 'Une Nuit de Cléopatre' is the composer's chef d'œuvre, no less than his 'Chant du cygne.' He was always so essentially French in style that his life-work never became very well known beyond the frontier. Massé had no touch of the genius that distinguished Auber, Boïeldieu and Hérold in the past, and that marks Gounod and Bizet among the musicians of our generation. But among his own compatriots the composer of 'Galathée' and 'Les Noces de eannette' had a high reputation, which he had conscientiously striven hard to obtain. In 'Une Nuit de Cléo-patre' he is heard at his best. If the melodies are not distinguished by striking originality, they are always elegant and expressive; and are invariably set off by delicate and finished orchestration. ... The interpretation leaves scarcely anything to be desired. Madame Heilbron, in the very arduous part of the Queen Egypt, exhibits such passion as her most ardent admirers did not give her credit for possessing. Nor must a débutante, Mdlle. Reggini, who impersonated Charmian, be left unmentioned, for her charming mezzo-soprano and excellent method aided much in the general effect. The most original morceau of the work, a berceuse of quaint form, fell to her share, and also received the compliment of a genuine encore. M. Taskin was excellent, both as singer and actor, in an episodical character, and the general performance, as regards orchestra and chorus, was absolutely beyond reproach. 'Une Nuit de Cléopatre' will have a great success at the Opéra Comique, but not, I think, anywhere else." Similarly favourable criticisms have appeared concerning the work in the French art journals, and the opera continues one of the principal attractions of M. Carvalho's establishment.

The following has been the financial result of the leading Parisian operatic institutions in 1884, according to M. Soubier's almanack-viz., Grand Opéra, with 190 performances, 2,646,269 francs; Opéra Comique, with 160 performances, 1,734,137 francs; Opéra Italien, with 95 performances, 1,127,525 francs.

During the continuance of the present International Exhibition at Antwerp no less than thirty grand Concerts are to be given on the part of the "Association des Artistes musiciens" (in addition to the usual performances of military and other bands) to be conducted alternately by MM. Altogether, music, the most "international" of all arts, bids fair to be well represented at this new "world's fair." Franz Liszt is expected to arrive at Antwerp on the 4th inst., where a Mass of his will be performed, in St. Joseph's Church, on the 7th, under direction of M. Peter Benoit. In the afternoon of the same day a festival performance, devoted to works by the veteran pianistcomposer, will take place, conducted by Franz Servais.

A Society has recently been founded in Russia, under the auspices of an influential committee, at the head of which stands the name of Tchaikowsky, for the purpose of creating employment for and granting relief to needy musicians. These laudable objects are to be attained by special Concert undertakings and the founding of music schools in various parts of the country. The Society is also concerned with forming a library, and establishing an asylum for the reception of decayed musicians in connection with its general scheme. Here, at any rate, is an instance of "Russian enterprise"—a topic so variously discussed of late-which will meet with universal approval and hearty good wishes for its success!

The Berlin Allgemeine Musik Zeitung publishes an interesting letter of the late Dr. Damrosch (dated New York, Sept. 5, 1883), wherein the modest and retiring nature of the great organiser of successful musical institutions, about whom, previous to his untimely death, so little was known on this side of the Atlantic, appears to the best possible advantage. The letter is addressed to his friend and fellow-worker in the cause of the modern development of musical art, Herr Richard Pohl, and its contents may be summed up in a quotation from the able and sympathetic observations with which Herr Pohl prefaces its publication-viz., " For more than a quarter of a century Damrosch has been the champion in the United States, of the three great modern masters, Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner, and in this capacity has shown a consistency of purpose, and an unfaltering perseverance which, taking into consideration the adverse circumstances by which his efforts were incessantly surrounded, must command universal admiration.

Herr Gericke, the successor of Herr Georg Henschel in the conductorship of the Boston "Symphony Concerts," has made himself very popular, both with the members of his excellent orchestra and his audience, during the season just completed, in the course of which he conducted twenty-

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—When the formation of this Commission first became known, there was a general feeling of hope amongst the Lay Vicars of our Cathedrals that their position would be improved-it could not well be made worse-and particularly that provision would be made in every case for their superannuation. The Dean and Chapter say in their replies to the questions of the Commissioners contained in a report of the proceedings in the case of our Cathedral, which now lies before me (after providing for the augmentation of the salaries of the Organist and Priest Vicars), "And also to provide retiring pensions for the superannuation of the Assistant Vicars-Choral (or Lay Vicars), and for other purposes connected with the Choir of the Cathedral, for all which purposes the Dean and Chapter believe there will be shortly, if not at present, ample funds.

Upon turning to the new statutes recommended by the Commissioners, I find, however, that not a single word is said about any pension to Lay Vicars; all questions of that sort stop short at the clerical members of the Cathedral and the Lay Vicars are referred to in the following terms: "They shall be appointed to hold office at the pleasure of the Dean and Chapter, subject to three months' notice of termination of the engagement on either side, with such stipends as shall be agreed upon. They shall perform such duties as the Dean and Chapter shall prescribe."
And the concluding clause is as follows: "No person who is expressed in these statutes to hold his place or office at the pleasure of the Dean and Chapter shall have any right of appeal from their decision."

Now what I particularly wish to know is, Why should so great a difference be made between clerical and lay members of cathedral establishments? In the case of Priest Vicars provision is made by statute both for their preferment and superannuation. The Canons are irremovable even though quite incapable of performing their far from arduous duties. One of our own Canons, for instance, against whom, however, I should be sorry to say one word of personal disrespect, has not been to the Cathedral for three or four years, and is not expected ever to be able to do so, yet he continues to receive his annual stipend (about £700), out of which he provides a substitute during his term of duty (three months), at the statutable remuneration of one guinea a day, say £100 altogether, leaving him virtually in the enjoyment of an annual pension of £600. I may say that in addition to this he holds a living of something more than £400 a year.
Why, I ask, if this is right and proper in a Canon, should a Lay Vicar be deprived of his whole income and office directly his voice begins to fail, or sooner, at the pleasure

From the nature of his appointment, a Lay Vicar seems to have an especial claim to a retiring pension; for, however talented he may be, his salary always remains at the humble £80 or £100 a year at which he began, and, if the arbitrary statutes before quoted should become law, this means that when his voice begins to fail, say at forty-five or fifty years of age, he may find himself, perhaps with a large family, suddenly deprived of his whole, or at least his main, source of livelihood, by the termination of his engagement at three months' notice, by the Dean and Chapter, without any right of appeal. And now let me make the following comparison :-

Canon Residentiary (probably with a good living in addition). Stipend, £700, with no fear of deprivation, however incapable he may become. Duties-Read one lesson at each service during thirteen weeks, and preach one sermon on thirteen Sundays.

Minor Canon or Priest Vicar (probably with either a living or chaplaincy in addition). Stipend, say £300. Duties—Chant half the prayers at each service during alternate weeks. Provision made for preferment or pension, or both.

Lay Vicar (other employment or source of addition to income most difficult to obtain). Salary, say £100. Duties-Every choral service throughout the year, with the exception of perhaps three weeks in summer and occasional special leave. Go whenever the Dean and Chapter choose to send you, no pension, and no appeal.

In conclusion, let me hope that some abler pen than mine may be induced to take the matter up, in order that the claims of the Lay Vicars may be properly represented vin Parliament before the most disappointing recommendations of the Cathedral Establishments Commissioners become law; and I recommend every Lay Vicar to procure a copy of the Report of his particular Cathedral, which can be obtained through and pence.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

THE CONCLUDING VOLUNTARY.

· Sir,—Whatever may be the opinion of your readers as to either the utility or the final issue of this controversy, the letter it has elicited from the Rev. H. Greeves, will, I feel sure, meet with the warmest approval from that section of your readers who are desirous of retaining and more fully securing to the organ its right place in the Divine worship.

Musically, as well as otherwise, is it true that there is no new thing under the sun, for the objection to the use of the organ as a solo instrument in the services of the Protestant church dates at least as far back as the time of Bach, who, it is stated, once received a hint from his ecclesiastical superiors to the effect that his playing "confounded the people," the real fact being that the congregation was so struck by his wonderful choral-preludes as to entirely forget to join in the hymns.

That the Concluding Voluntary has been shamefully abused by "thoughtless players" goes without saying, as does also the fact that the effect of a Voluntary depends to a large extent upon its applicability to the service. And here crops up an important aspect of the controversy, which seems very materially to have been lost sight ofviz., that what a conscientious organist (acting upon the principle that it his duty to incorporate into the Divine worship only the highest treasures of musical art) might deem highly appropriate would appear quite otherwise to a large majority of his audience, to whom classical organ music, or arrangements of the greatest musical in-spirations of past and present ages, would be as books "sealed with seven seals." As to the "irreverent entry of a fugue," that depends entirely upon the fugue selected, since, in my humble opinion, such fugues as Mendelssohn's No. 2, in G, Bach's B minor (Ed. Peters, Book III.), taken at a slow tempo, and hosts of others too numerous to mention, are highly calculated to intensify any religious impressions a service may have produced.

While giving Mr. Parratt and his supporters due credit for the honesty of their convictions, I cannot but think that were they confined to some more limited sphere of public performance they would be glad to avail themselves of an occasional Concluding Voluntary, if for no higher motive than to gain a relief from the monotony of continually accompanying, and to secure an opportunity of publicly performing a little genuine organ music.

If the clergy, choir, and congregation have their respective parts in our worship, to abolish the Concluding Voluntary would be to deprive the organist of the best of the few opportunities he possesses of demonstrating the harmony of his religious feelings with his artistic skill. With reference to the "impressive silence" before and after service, about which some of our opponents have so much to say, I must confess that, although I have been listening At a meeting of the Senate of the University of Cambridge, for it for years, I have never yet succeeded in finding it, on May 19, 1877, Mr. Sedley Taylor, M.A., Fellow of not even in the most Conservative of Presbyterian Churches, where an organ might be regarded as savouring of Popery. On the other hand, even in churches where the Voluntary is prescribed, the conclusion of the Benediction is too often the signal for the "religious rush" so frequently made by the irreverent section of a departing congregation. I think enough has been said to show that a silence sufficient to be "impressive" is almost impossible at the close of any ordinary service, and with all due respect to the saying attributed to Mozart, that the greatest effect in music is "the cessation of music," I am inclined to question whether, in the event of silence being possible, it would be as "impressive" as an eloquent discourse from the " king of instruments."

Trusting that the result of this controversy may be alike beneficial to both organists and auditory, I beg to remain, Yours respectfully,

O. A. MANSFIELD, F.C.O., L.Mus., T.C.L. Fairlawn, Trowbridge, Wilts.

MUSICAL DEGREES.

SIR,-Your correspondent in THE MUSICAL TIMES for May, who wrote under the nom de plume of "Quæro Justitiam," is much mistaken in his statement concerning the expense of a degree in music at Trinity College, Dublin University. The fee for the degree of Bachelor in Music to men who are Graduates in Arts is only £5, and to Undergraduates it is £10, and not £35 as stated by the above-named correspondent. The fee for the degree of Doctor in Music is £20, and not £45, as the same correspondent stated. Again he is wrong as to the requirement to be able to translate Homer, since under the present "Regulations for obtaining the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music in the University of Dublin, a candidate for degrees in music may substitute for Greek, at the entrance examination, any modern language other than English." I have taken my information from the most recent issue of the Dublin University Calendar. It seems to me that, far from complaining that in order to take a degree in music, they have to pass the (by no means excessively severe) literary examination which every undergraduate has to pass in order to begin the course of study for any degree in the university; intending graduates in music have great cause to be thankful that they may graduate in music without residence, although many of them are very well-to-do persons; while intending curates or surgeons (often far poorer men as to pecuniary resources than the average music-master) are obliged to incur the heavy expense in time and money of many terms' residence, extending over several years, in order to obtain the degree of B.A. or M.B. If musicians are unwilling or unable to prove themselves men of general education and culture, they have no claim to "degrees," but can, of course, avail themselves of the examinations for diplomas or certificates open to them, such, for instance, as those of the "Royal Academy of Music," the "Society of Professional Musicians," or the "College of Organists," which will certify whether they can play or sing, or answer questions up to a certain point, upon the theory of music.

Degrees in any faculty are not meant for persons without an excellent general education, and it is too late, now that education is advancing rather than receding, to ask or expect that the Universities, or either of them, shall abrogate their function of fostering higher education by accepting, as qualification for their degrees, acquirements inferior in quality or extent to those they have hitherto exacted.

It is generally mentioned as redounding to the honour of Dublin University that her present Professor, Sir Robert Stewart, Mus. D., was the first to institute a literary examination for Graduates in Music, which he did in 1860. Many years afterwards, the Universities of Oxford (in 1877) and of Cambridge (in 1878) followed Dublin's Is it reasonable to suppose that either of them example. will lead the way back to the darkness of ignorance after having pursued the forward path to the light of learning.

Trinity College, Cambridge (speaking of the new regulations for Degrees in Music, then under discussion), is reported to have said, "It is not the business of the University to issue licenses to professional practitioners in music, but to attest the possession of a sound independent knowledge of the subject." In conclusion, let me express a hope that the now very high position in public estimation of Degrees in Music, obtained by examination at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and London, may not be lowered; that persons possessing technical acquirements only will obtain only technical certificates, and that degrees will remain to be in the future as they are now, the higher reward for higher knowledge.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, Oxon., CANTAB., and T.C.D.

EDWARD HEESOM'S VIOLINS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I should be very glad if you spare me a line or two of your valuable space to ask those of your readers who are interested in violins and violin makers whether they can furnish any particulars respecting an old violin maker—viz., Edward Heesom, who flourished about 1750. I possess a violin by this maker, signed "Edward Heesom, London, Fecit 1749," and I believe the finish of the workmanship and quality of tone would satisfy the most fastidious connoisseur, or at least one who believes that an Englishman can make a good fiddle.

I have not been able to view the collection of violins at South Kensington, as it is not yet (May 18) open to the public; but I am anxious to find out whether this old English maker is represented there.

I am, yours faithfully, A. M. COLCHESTER.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABBRGAVENNY.—The members of the Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season in the Town Hall, on Thursday, April 23. Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maidan formed the first part of the programme. The soloists were Madame Bellamy, Miss Emilie Harris, Mr. Edward Kenp and Mr. D. Harrison; Conductor, Mr. Throne Biggs, Organist of St. Mary's, Abergavenny.

Intone Biggs, Organist of St. Mary's, Abergavenny.

BALTIMORE.—The last of the Peabody Concerts for the present season was given at the Peabody Conservatory on April 16, when Asger Hamerick's Symphonie Tragique formed the most important item in the programme. The American papers speak in the very highest terms of this work, which was most warmly received, and the composer called forward to receive the enthusiastic congratulations of pianoforte compositions by Liszt; Miss Ella Earle sang three songs by the same composer, and the Concert concluded with Berlioz's Overture to King Lear.

Overture to King Lear.

Belfars, "The Queen's College Musical Society gave its third Concert of the season in the Constitutional Hall, on the 6th ult. Amongst the choral picces were Eaton Faining's very clever composition called "The Miller's Wooing," and a chorus for female voices by Cherubini, "Blanche of Provence," both of which were admirably sung and much applauded. Herr Lauer played with excelent effect a solo by Vieuxtemps on the violin, and other pieces, which elicited enthusiastic marks of approbation; and vocal solos were contributed, several of which were unanimously encored. The Concert was conducted by Herr Beyschlag with his usual ability.

BEXLEY HEATH.—Mr. J. Flint gave an excellent Concert at the Albert Road Schools, on the 11th ult., assisted by the Choral Society, Mr. J. Turpin, Mus. Bac., and Mr. H. E. Hast. Mr. Turpin's pianoforte solos were exceedingly well rendered, and his duet with Mr. Flint elicited much applause. Praise must also be accorded to Mr. Hast, whose songs were admirably sung, and created a marked effect.

BURY.—An Organ Recital was given on April 28, at Christian Church, by Mr. David Clegg, Organist, Congregational Church, Bamford. The organ is an excellent two-manual instrument, recetted by P. Conacher & Sons, Huddersfield. An excellent programme was well rendered.

erected by P. Conacher & Sons, Huddersfield. An excellent programme was well rendered.

Canders.—The performance for the first time in Wales of Mackenzie's dramatic Oratorio The Rose of Sharow drew together a large and fashionable audience on the evening of April 20, the body of the hall not having a seat vacant. Miss Mary Davies, who represented the Sulamite, sang with that exquisite finish which, added to the charms of her flexible soprano voice, has made her such a general favourite, Very notable was her rendering of the parts comprised in the Temptation, and a species of invocation at its close. Miss Hilds Wilson, in the part of a Woman, made a remarkable commencement in the prologue, "We will open our mouths in a parable," and her singing throughout the work, especially in the solo "Lo, the King," was extremely fine. The tenor music had a very able exponent in Mr. Edward Lloyd as the Beloved. One of his choicest renderings was "Oh! my Dove," in the part representing Separation. So, too, in the portion signalising Victory, he sang with much effect "Open to me" and "My head is filled with dew," the last being most warmly appreciated. The part of Solomon was taken by Mr. Watkin Mills. In "Ere the day cool" he attained to a very high degree of excellence. The choir was admirably conducted by Mr. J. C. Davis, the singing showing enerally the result of most and the praise bestowed on the chorus may be extended to the band, led by Mr. J. T. Carrodus. When the close was reached, at a quarter after eleven, scarcely a dozen persons had left the sustained high character of the rendering of a pre-eminently high-class creation. The work was announced to be repeated on the 50th ults.

Carmanturen.—The Organist of St. Peter's, Mr. Videon Harding, was high with the seal the seal to the seal to the seal to the seal of the contraction.

CARMARTHEN.—The Organist of St. Peter's, Mr. Videon Harding, gave his sixteenth annual Concert in the Assembly Rooms, on the 7th ult., before a large audience. Misses Vinnie Beaumont and Marian Ellis, Mr. R. Andrews and Mr. Harding were the vocalists, and Miss L. T. Jones, R.A.M., accompanied. The efforts of the performers were well received, Miss Beaumont's solos being encored. The part-singing was particularly good.

CHELMSTORD.—The Chelmsford Musical Society gave an admirable performance of Costa's Oratorio Eli, on April 20, at the Corn Exchange. The chorus-singing was very good. Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Poole, Mr., Kenningham, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. de Lacy were the solicists. The choir numbered over 100, and there was an orchestra of about thirty performers, mostly professional. The conductor was Mr. F. K. Frye, F.C.O., who has brought the Society to a high standard of excellence

CLAY CROSS .- On Tuesday evening, April 28, the Musical Associa-CLAY CROSS.—On I tessage yeening, April 25, the Musicial Associa-tion performed Haydri's Creation before a large audience in the New Lecture Hall. Christie, vocalists; Miss Pitts, violin; Mr. Sewell-Southgate-accompanist, and Mr. W. H. Treffry, Conductor. The well-known duet "Maying," by Miss Alice Mary Smith, was extremely well sung by Miss Ellis Walton and Mr. Ralph Dawes, and a new song, "The child and the autumn leaf" (Ralph Dawes), was very favourably received. EALING .- A miscellaneous Concert was given at the Lyric Hall, Ersom.—The Choral Society, under the able conductorabip of Mr. G. E. Good, gave an excellent Concert in the Public Hall, on the 1st ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to Mendelsaeohu's Lauda Sion, and the second to Sterndale Bennett's May Queen. The solo vocalists were Miss Hilda Coward, Miss Lily Turpin, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. J. Hailes, all of whom were highly efficient. The pianoforte and organ accompaniments were played by the Rev. S. J. Rowton and Mrs. J. Hailes respectively.

GATESHEAD FELL.—The usual invitation Concert at the close of the Spring session was given by the Amateur Vocal Society at the Low Fell on Thursday, the 7th ult. The principal work performed was Macfarren's Cantata, May Day, in which the choir sang with good effect. The solo was sung by Miss May Catcheside, who surmounted its difficulties with great ease. The other solo vocalists were Miss Upton and Mr. Fred Mace. The violin solos of Mr. J. H. Beers, whom we have never related to greater dynamage, were descreedly with the control of the cont piano, and Mr. Rowley conducted as usual.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA .- A highly successful Organ Recital was Gleen in St. Andrew's Church, on Saturday, April 24, by Mr. W. K. Colbeck, the recently appointed Organist. The programme was varied and well selected, Mr. Colbeck rendering all the items in his well known masterly manner. Vocal solos were contributed by Mrs. Wicting and Mr. J. F. Alson Williams.

Wieting and Mr. J. F. Alston Williams.

GRENOCK.—An Organ Recital and Concert of sacred music was given at Finnart United Presbyterian Church on April 27, before a large and most appreciative audience. The organ solos of Mr. Methwen and Mr. W. E. Duncan, A.C.O., and scholar of the Royal College of Music, were well chosen and excellently rendered; vocal solos and several pieces by the Church choir being also included in the programme.—An excellent Concert was given by the Orpheus Club, in aid of the Eye Infirmary, on April 30, at the Town Hall. Some organ solos, introducing various national airs, well played by Mr. Channon Cornwali, gave rise to very decisive political demonstrations on the part of the large audience assembled, the disturbance being quelled by the performance of "God Save the Queen." All the partsongs were finely rendered; and solos were effectively given by two gentlemen, who made their debut on the occasion. Mr. Middleton conducted with his accustomed ability.

HADLERGH (SUPFOUK).— Judas Maccabaus was performed in the

R.A.M., Mr. Frederick Williams, and Mr. Thomas Lawler; leader of the band, Mr. H. Bayaton; Organist, Mr. F. S. Wykes; Conductor, Mr. R. A. Slater. The Concert was highly successful.

Mr. R. A. Slater. The Concert was highly successful.

WARR, HERTS.—The Musical Society gave its fifth Annual Concert at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, April 28. The first part consisted of Sir Sterndale Bennett's Pastoral The May Queen, and the second part of a Miscellaneous Sciection. The artists engaged were Madame Litta Jarratt, Miscellaneous Sciection. The artists engaged were Madame Litta Jarratt, Miscellaneous Sciection, All 1997. The Choruses were well rendered by the members of the Society, and the performance reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O. There was a small though efficient band, and the hall was well filled by an appreciative audience.—The usual monthly Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, on April 30, by Mr. George Herbert Gregory, Mus. B. (of Boston), and Mr. James L. Gregory, F.C.O. Both artists were highly successful in all their performances, and Mr. G. H. Gregory gave songs by Cowen and Gaul with much effect.

"Mr. Ainsworth (Fellow of the Society of Science) has most ingeniously arranged his Organ Pedal Attachments for Pianofortes, so as to allow their being locked (when not in use) by simply drawing out a stop. The Organ Pedals can also be removed and replaced at will. The most valuable arrangement, however, is that of perfect freedom, there not being even a possible chance of sticking or getting out of order."

PROSPECTUS.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in The Musical Thurs, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by them-salves."

selves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to Convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each componer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

For the copious extracts made from letters, &c., throughout the series, no apology is offered. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character.

Contains a Special Paper on "HANDEL AND HIS POR-TRAITS," the purpose of which is partly musical and biographical, and partly one of art criticism. It is illustrated with engravings of the "Chandos Portrait," painted by Thornhill, from the Fitzwilliam Museum; of the fine Grafoni, in the same collection; of Mr. Henry Littleton's famous Roubillac—the "Vauxhall Statue," as it is called; of Zincke's graphic and interesting miniature, now the property of Mr. H. B. Lennard; of the engraving by Schmidt, which Hawkins thought the best likeness of all; and (by permission of Earl Howe) of the full length, painted by Hudson, for Charles Jennens, the librettist of "Messiah," and from the first an ornament of the "Messiah Room"

TWELVE VOCAL DUETS FOR SCHOOL USE Words by EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, "April," and No. 5, "May," are our special favourires, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where slaters or friends delight in joining voices. The planoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary planist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

SHORT SETTINGS

EDITED BY GEORGE C. MARTIN. Price One Shilling each.

Church-music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir, and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral societies are almost universal. This want is specially felt with regard to music for the Office of Holy Communion, and it is hoped that these services will be found well within the capabilities of an ordinary choir, yet not wanting in an effort to give due expression to the solemnity of the words.

WILM,

DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS FROM ANCIENT TYPES, BY

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.

"The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has he accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Musical Times. MUSIC PRIMERS

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

PREFACE.

There is an ever-increasing conviction that decency and order are better promoted by the singing than the saying of the Offertory See tences—and that not only in our larger, but in our smaller churches a well. In the latter the adoption of the desired use is to a great exten prevented by the anthem character of the music employed in the usual offertory setting.

The following arrangements are more especially intended for the use of those choirs who, not being regularly trained in anthem-singing, are accustomed to rely on the tunelleness, form, and compact ness of the hymn-tune for aid in filly rendering the words they sing.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

"I am much obliged to you for sending me your | elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . doubtless will prove of great utility.

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"IOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."-Musical Standard.

"The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."-Academic Gazette.

"They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."-Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more charm."-Oldham Evening Chronicle.

The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."-Illustrated London News.

"These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."-Public Opinion.

"A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."-C. D., Household Words.

"The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike."-Sunday Times.

"That the work is based upon sound philosophical principles is certain, and it may be said with confidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with."-Birmingham

"The exercises are emphatically practical; but they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive melody, occasionally rising far above the character of mere training compositions."-Salisbury Times.

"The authors have conferred a great boon on the musical world and on the public generally by the "This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based publication of these exercises, which so happily on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of combine science with simplicity and system with

BOWMANVILLE, ONTARIO, CANADA.

ACTION-

Inventors of the Double Valve Action, both valves opening with only one pitman; originators of the manner of opening Back Valve by means of Lever. By this invention our larger Organs have the advantage over any other makers, using Exhaust Bellows, as by the free and proper distribution of the Vibrators we are enabled to produce quick speech from the largest to the smallest reed, with either light or strong blowing of Bellows. Our Mr. G. Piggott originated this action in the year 1873, and the same has been perfected and used by us for the last ten years.

SCRIBNER TUBES-

Only by the above system of action can the Scribner Tubes be used with full effect, as the register in connection with the Tubes opens into the back valve, thereby adding greatly to the power and brilliancy of the Tube Register or set of Reeds. The invention known as Scribner Tubes we have used for the last ten years, neither time nor expense having been spared in improving and perfecting the same, and only in our various Combination Styles can the best effect of this invention be found.

TWO-MANUAL ORGANS—
Our various styles of Two-Manual and Pedal Organs are simple in construction, and the coupler movements are not liable to get out of order. We particularly call attention to the arrangement of the Vibrators or Reeds, also to the Pedal and Manual Coupler arrangements, of which we are the original inventors.

Style 93.

Our system of Bellows will withstand all climatic changes, as by our method of construction all risks of cracking and splitting are avoided, all the wooden parts being pinned and pannelled, leaving an opening of about one-eighth of an inch between panel and frame work, which is covered with strong rubber drill.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER and CO. have the honour to announce that during the ensuing season (1885-86) they propose to give at ST. JAMES'S HALL, a series of Concerts under the above title.

These performances will be, to some extent, a revival of the "ORATORIO CONCERTS" given by Messrs. Novello from 1869 to 1875. In resuming their task it will be the aim of the Directors to secure the utmost possible perfection of detail, the demand for which has so materially advanced during the last few years.

The most distinguished Solo Vocalists will be engaged and the Orchestra will be selected from the best Instrumentalists in London. The Choir will be chosen with the greatest care, and will consist of about 250 voices.

CONDUCTOR, MR. MACKENZIE.

ADIES AND GENTLEMEN wishing to join the Choir should apply at once to the Choir Secretary, Mr. STEDMAN, 12, Berners Street, W.

For all other particulars application should be made to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., 1, Berners Street, W.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

"Mr. Ainsworth (Fellow of the Society of Science) has most ingeniously arranged his Organ Pedal Attachments for Pianofortes, so as to allow their being locked (when not in use) by simply drawing out a stop. The Organ Pedals can also be removed and replaced at will. The most valuable arrangement, however, is that of perfect freedom, there not being even a possible chance of sticking or getting out of order."

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in THE MUSICAL TIMES, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw hight upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first tille "The Great Composers, sketched by them-the series had for just title. The creat Composers, secticle by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notice were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "sketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography."

The intention of "Novellos Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first set towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

to whom they are devoted.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

THE last of the links that bound together the present of music with the era of the great classic masters has been severed. While one lived who had received instructions from Weber, and had looked Beethoven in the face, we were reminded how rapid after all had been the modern development of our art, and how rash were the assumptions of those who preached the doctrine of finality before the true significance of the work done by the composers named, and others of the same epoch, could be guaged by the calm light that history sheds. But the death of Benedict materially increases that atmosphere of far-removedness which serves to cast a halo upon those who come within its influence. The epoch which closed with the death of Beethoven is no longer connected with our own by any personality, and the labourers therein must henceforth be regarded solely by their written utterances. We can no longer learn from living witnesses how they spoke and looked while yet in the flesh. Such is one of the considerations forced upon the mind of the thoughtful musician by the death of Sir Julius Benedict. Another, and one more deeply interesting in a national sense, arises from the contemplation of the wonderful changes in the nature of musical work in England since Benedict elected to cast in his lot with us. In 1835, when at the advice of Malibran he came to London, music as an art, apart from oratorio, was an exotic in this country; and even in the special domain just mentioned things were done which would make amateurs creep with horror at the present day. foreigner was paramount everywhere, and young Benedict found no difficulty in obtaining recognition for his exceptional talents. But he was profoundly astonished at the low status which the professional musician occupied in the social circle at that time. We remember him relating his experiences at the first private musical performance in which he was called upon to take part. If we think of Costa, it is as a conductor, notwith-The artists, instead of being received as equalsnay, as honoured guests—as they would have been But it would be hard to say in which department in his own country, were penned off in a corner of Benedict gained most of his reputation. He made the room lest they should by accident rub shoulders essays in all, and in all he won distinction. Perhaps with my lords and ladies. The youthful musician it cannot be said that he was ever a great confelt inclined to resent this treatment, but his ductor, but he would scarcely have been suffered practical common-sense restrained him, and he to wield the $b\hat{a}ton$ for so many years at the Norwich lived to see the aristocracy of art placed on a Festival and the Liverpool Philharmonic Society level with the aristocracy of birth on all points had he not proved himself competent to discharge where equality ought to prevail. It is said that the duties appertaining to his office in these un-Benedict has in great part written an autobio- dertakings. As a teacher he was at the head of graphy, and if his manuscript is sufficiently advanced to be given to the world it cannot fail to prove a most valuable and entertaining contribution to the musical history of our country. This is not the place to enter at length into the matters with which such a work would deal; but we have approached the subject before speaking of the personality of the dead artist, because in considering the latter it is necessary to observe whether the time and the man were suited to each other, and whether if a new Benedict were to settle in our metropolis and naturalise himself he could hope to gain similar ascendancy in all the musical councils of the nation. Probably not to the same extent, though no amount of patriotism can blind us to the fact that we are still in great measure indebted to foreign talent and enterprise for the machinery by which the art is kept before the public. In some of the obituary notices of Sir Julius Benedict it has been complacently observed that although we owe a lasting debt of gratitude to him and to the great Neapolitan conductor who expired a year ago, yet now they have gone to their rest musical England is strong enough to run alone. It may be so, but on reflection we fancy the writers would be forced to admit that the sudden disappearance say, of Mr. Manns, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Carl Rosa, and Herr Richter would leave some very ugly gaps which it might prove impossible to fill.

Turning now to the more satisfactory subject of the life and labours of Sir Julius Benedict himself, we are at once struck with profound admiration at the spectacle of talent supplemented by industry almost without a parallel, at any rate, in the records of art. If Goethe's definition of genius, as the capacity of taking infinite pains, were correct, then would Benedict have been one of the greatest musical geniuses the world has ever seen. But an arbitrary thesis such as this, though it may contain a truth, is seldom, if ever, the whole truth. It is not as a creator but as a worker that the deceased musician has earned a right to a niche in our national arttemple. Unlike others, he did not follow the bent of any natural guidance and devote himself to some one sphere of labour with perhaps occasional excursions into neighbouring art territory. standing his unquestionable success as a composer. his profession for very many years. To be able to write the words "Pupil of Sir Julius Benedict," after his or her name, was an honour coveted by almost every young musician, and the spell of the name was so potent that it was far from an idle desire. At one period his skill as a solo pianist was very great, and many who have scarcely yet attained middle age, remember the charm and delicacy of his touch. But, in the capacity of accompanist, or as it was then termed, "conductor," he was absolutely without a rival. For the first twenty years of their existence he fulfilled this office at the Monday Popular Concerts with complete acceptance by the subscribers and public. It is not too much to say that no one dreamed of giving a concert during the fashionable season without securing the nominal if not the active co-operation of Benedict. Taking into consideration the immense amount of work he managed to accomplish in the directions already named, it is a matter for surprise that he found any time for composition. But throughout his extended career his pen was ever active and prolific, and in respect of quantity he must be accounted one of the leading composers of his time. Here again we note the many-sided nature of his powers. He began by writing operas for Naples, Stuttgart and London, and his lyric works composed for our own metropolis-"The Gipsy's Warning," "The Crusaders," and "The Brides of Venice"-achieved no ordinary measure of success. They are now forgotten, save for isolated airs which are still sometimes heard, but "The Lily of Killarney," composed for the Pyne and Harrison management at Covent Garden, chef d'œuvre. In sacred choral works his success has been no less conspicuous. "The Legend of St. Cecilia," composed for Norwich in 1866, and "St. Peter," produced at Birmingham in 1870, contain much beautiful music. Musicians who by common consent, deserved to take very high exhibit genius it is certainly an outcome of sorrow, and he had quietly resigned all his imporand the lighter branches of composition, in reward.

which may be included songs, part-songs, original pianoforte pieces, and transcriptions, were enriched continuously by his untiring efforts. It is understood that he has left a large quantity of music in manuscript, among which, no doubt, will be found some efforts which may with advantage be given to the world. For this a competent editor will be needed, who will carefully select only such pieces as will maintain the reputation of a composer who, if he never succeeded in producing a masterpiece, never associated his name with failure in any definite line of musicianly labour. Whether the next generation will accept the verdict of his contemporaries with regard to his productions, either large or small, is not a matter on which any dogmatic opinion should be given at the present time. Posterity must judge for itself in this particular; all that it behoves us to assert is that if natural ability, cultivated and applied with the utmost intensity of purpose, can accomplish lasting results, then the name of Benedict will not quickly disappear from concert programmes.

In his personal habits and method of living Sir Julius Benedict offered a stern but wholesome example to his brethren in art. He was never in any sense a society butterfly; abstemious to a fault, he generally declined the hospitality of those with whom he was brought into professional contact, and the veriest trifles of his daily life were ordered with undeviating precision and exactitude. To many it will doubtless appear surprising that such a hard and successful worker should not have accumulated wealth steadily if not rapidly. Unfortunately his wonderful business capacity yet survives, and may be accounted his operatic did not prevent him from embarking in art speculations which promised well but ended disastrously. It is unnecessary to enlarge on this point; enough, that during the time he enjoyed the sunshine of public favour his purse strings were always unloosed when charity claimed his aid, were present at the first performance of the and no musician has left behind him a better repuformer work, or when it was subsequently given tation for gentle courtesy, kindness to young and in London by the Sacred Harmonic Society, struggling members of his profession, and all the will remember the effect created by the finale, graces which should adorn an artist than he, with the late Mdlle. Tietjens in the title rôle, whose death was unexpectedly announced on the "St. Peter" unquestionably suffered by reason 5th ult. We say unexpectedly, but, in truth, his of the unsatisfactory libretto furnished to the life's work was fairly finished-far more so composer by Chorley, but in spite of this draw- than that of his beloved master, Weber, who back he succeeded in producing a work which, preceded him exactly fifty-nine years to the very day. Had Benedict been called away rank among oratorios of the present generation. thirty, twenty, or even ten years ago, musical It is difficult to define the exact border line work in London would have been seriously dewhich separates genius from mere talent. But ranged; but he had attained to those fourscore if the storm scene in "St. Peter" does not years when man's strength is but labour and the very highest order of talent. He had worthily employed quartets, and, in fact, all forms of classical the talents committed to his charge and we are music engaged his attention from time to time, permitted to hope that he has entered upon his

MUSIC AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

No apology is needed for returning to the subject of the Inventions Exhibition and its relations to musical art. The undertaking is attracting a larger share of public attention than has been bestowed on any enterprise of any kind in London since the International Exhibition of 1862. That would not in itself constitute a reason for paying any heed to it in our columns; but as music forms one of the leading features in the plan of the show, as much in a technical as a popular sense, it behoves those whose duty it is to maintain a watchful care over all that concerns the interests of the art to scrutinise with the utmost closeness everything that is done, to applaud and encourage every well-advised act, and to point out in the clearest manner whatever seems out of keeping with the true aims of an affair of this kind. Last month it was our painful duty to censure the authorities for having, as it seemed to us, neglected their proper functions, partly, it may be, with a view of filling their coffers, and partly from sheer ignorance, or at any rate heedlessness, of the right course to pursue. There is no need to qualify in the slightest degree anything that was then said, and, in fact, the experience of the past month has tended to confirm the views formerly expressed. On the present occasion we will deal with the unpleasant side of the picture first, as something may fairly be said in the way of approval of future arrangements. The first appearance of the much talked of Strauss Orchestra was evidently regarded with great interest, the gardens being thronged with people, while the strangers received a hearty welcome, as was fit and proper as a matter of national courtesy. They came, they saw, but it can scarcely be said that they conquered. Indeed, the opening piece in their first programme, an overture of Balie's, tended to show that there was a very weak place in their armour, and it was not until they started work on the Strauss repertory of dance music that the listeners began to recognise any merit whatever in their playing. What followed we all remember very well. press almost unanimously gave the Austrians credit for their singularly piquant rendering of waltzes, polkas, and galops, but told them with cruel bluntness that, as regards all other kinds of music, they might as well have stayed at home. Naturally Herr Eduard Strauss was nettled at this kind of criticism, and the Council had its amour propre equally wounded by the suggestion that it had wasted its money. What was to be done? The situation as it stood could not, of course, be accepted, so it was cleverly suggested that it was all the fault of playing in the open air. Now, we have it on the authority of Berlioz, that "there is no such thing as open air music," his opinion probably being the result of the complete failure of his Symphony "Funèbre et Triomphale," as it was first given in front of the Bastille. So it was given forth that the Albert Hall was the proper place for the "finer portions" of the Strauss répertoire, and special invitations were issued for a Concert in the huge Rotunda on the 9th ult. The occasion was probably unique in its way. Certainly we can call to mind no similar instance of critics and musicians being called together to pronounce a serious verdict on such a programme as was then put before them. The "finer portions" consisted of fairly good transcriptions of an old English air, and Schubert's "Ave Maria," and a most cruel distortion of Chopin's Marche Funèbre. At Promenade Concerts this kind of thing may be heard in abundance, but the managers of such entertainments do not ostenta-

they do. It is their business to cater for the million. and if they please their patrons no one outside has any reason for complaint. Similarly with regard to the Strauss orchestra. It has its peculiar functions, and it performs them right well. We may go further, and assert that dance music, as well as any other kind, may be rendered in an artistic or an inartistic way. But about the "finer portions" the less said the better, from an art or any other point of view. Herr Strauss is reported to have said to an interviewer that he found the English public did not understand Wagner's music. Here we might paraphrase the answer given by Claude Melnotte in "The Lady of Lyons," when Damas accuses him of not understanding his own language-" Not as you play it." But enough on a subject which necessarily exercised all interested in music, and which has therefore been discussed more exhaustively than its merits warrant. The Strauss orchestra is giving pleasure to an enormous number of people, and the main point of our contention is-not that its engagement was a mistake in itself, but that the Council are to blame in having made it the principal feature in their musical arrangements. At least an equal sum of money should have been expended on native talent, and we have no hesitation in asserting that had this been done the English executants would have more than held their own against the foreigners.

We are glad to note that the arrangements are in active progress for the historic Concerts in connection with the Loan Exhibition in the Albert Hall. The Music Committee announced a performance of the Court Band of His Majesty the King of Siam on the 22nd ult., and one by the Round, Catch, and Canon Club on the 24th. The former can scarcely be included with fitness among historic Concerts, but as a curiosity it was remarkable enough. It is said that these Asiatic minstrels, who play upon strange and primitive instruments, and make odd noises not in the least degree resembling western music, have no claim to the title of "Court Band," but are merely a miscellaneous collection of players sent over by the Siamese Government to represent the music of the country. However this may be, their performances are singular in the extreme, and in their way by no means unpleasing. Some of the Concerts yet to come will be more interesting than these. Supposing the Committee to be desirous of rendering these performances really useful in an educational sense, the question would naturally be discussed where to commence; but on this point not much difference of opinion could be entertained. Amateurs are taught to regard Palestrina as the father of modern music, but musicians are aware that prior to the great Italian who saved Church-music from the ruin with which it was threatened by the decree of the Council of Trent, there existed in the Low Countries a remarkable art development, the most noteworthy exponents of which were Josquin Des Près and Orlando di Lasso. The founder of the Netherlands school may be said to have been Willem Dufay, who flourished in the latter part of the fourteenth century. He wrote masses on the air "L'Homme Armé," as did most of his successors until the thing became a scandal to art as well as religion. Other composers who distinguished themselves during this period, and whose works are still extant, are Johannes Ockeghem, Obrecht, Clemens non Papa, and finally Jan Pieters Sweelinck. We have drawn attention to this period in musical history because it is gratifying to note that the Music Committee have made arrangements with a party of Dutch artists to give a series of three Concerts on the 15th, 16th, and 18th inst., the programmes of which will consist of tiously ask for a severely judicial opinion on what extracts from the works of the composers above named and possibly others. The vocalists will be Miss W. Gips, Miss C. van Reunes, Miss C. Esser, Miss C. Veltman, and Messrs. T. T. Rogmans, M. T. Keba, T. M. Messchaert, and A. Spoel, with Mr. S. de Lange as Organist, and M. D. de Lange as Conductor. We fancy those who attend these performances will be astonished at the amount of feeling and expression in some of the music of this remote epoch, particularly in the works of Josquin. Other arrangements have likewise been made, and some are still in progress. On the 1st, 2nd, and 4th inst. there will be "Concerts of ancient music on ancient instruments," carried out by fourteen members of the Brussels Conservatoire. Harpsichords, spinets, regals, various kinds of viols, flutes, &c., will be employed at these performances, which can scarcely fail to prove highly interesting. On the 8th the Bristol Madrigal Society will give a Concert of English and Italian madrigals. There will also be Concerts of Italian and English vocal music of the 16th and 17th centuries, on the 14th and 22nd instant. After all, the artistic outlook at South Kensington is not so dreary as it seemed a few weeks ago. We hope next month to be able to chronicle a more distinct advance.

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett.

V .- MUSIC IN CHICAGO .- THEATRE MUSIC, &c.

My experiences of music in the great city on Lake Michigan should have been told under the head of "Orchestral Music," but were held over for considerations of space. Let me now make haste to say that I have only pleasant memories of Chicago. One day saw me reach the city a total stranger to everybody in it; the next installed me among those whose cordiality, and obvious desire to make my stay agreeable, might have been an outcome of old friendship. I mention their great hospitality and my own gratitude at the risk of having it said that I permit the fact and the feeling to tinge my musical impressions with a very natural rose colour.

Chicago was not musically active during my stay there in the early part of last December. I was fortunate enough, however, to catch two concerts on the wing - the one a Pianoforte Recital given by Herr Joseffy; the other a performance of the "Stabat Mater" (Rossini) and "Lobgesang," by the Apollo Musical Club. Regarding the first I am free to keep silence, since the merit of an Austrian pianist who happens to be in America scarcely comes within the range of these observations. At the same time, I must not forget that Joseffy appears to have settled himself in the United States "for good and all." He is a man of mark there, and makes himself known throughout the Union by comprehensive tours, which cannot but exert an influence upon public taste, and, to some extent, perhaps, upon the culture of the instrument he plays. My own reading of American musical criticism goes to show that Joseffy's status as a first-class pianist is by no means universally conceded. Some guides of popular opinion laud him all round; many others deny his possession of the high qualities required by an exponent of classic art. On which side Chicago amateurs range themselves as a majority I have no means of knowing. A moderately large audience attended the Recital in the Central Music Hall, and the performer's efforts were received with varying favour, regulated, as it ments than as an interpreter of classic masterpieces. He can charm by brilliant playing, and he presents the pretty trifles by "society" composers with all the attractions adapted to enhance the pleasure they give. But he should let Beethoven alone. His performance of a Sonata by that master was quite superficial, and at once disposed of any claims to leading rank he, or his friends for him, may have made.

The Apollo Musical Club is a Society formed rather on the model of our Philharmonic than on that of our Sacred Harmonic, although, like the second and unlike the first, its chief raison d'être is the performance of choral works for mixed voices and orchestra. Its organisation is somewhat elaborate. There are six "officers"—president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, librarian, and musical director. The "Board of Management" consists of five gentlemen, and the "Music Committee" of three. In addition, there is an "Advisary Board," thirty-five strong, while the "Associate Members," ladies and gentlemen, make up a total of two hundred and sixty-six. Curiously enough, the list of Associate Members contains a singular proportion of names in some way or other prominently connected with music. I find in it Arnold, Adams, Attwood, Aldrich, Bacon, Bishop, Berger, Carey, Clark, Dwight, Green, Jones, Morley, Purcell, Root, Wagner, and Whitney. If there be anything in a name, the Apollo Musical Club should possess it certainly. The organisation is leavened with the nomenclature of artistic eminence. Its practices are carried on, I believe, in an upper room of the Central Music Hall-a building erected, mainly for the purpose its name suggests, at the instigation of a young journalist, whose memory—he died prematurely—is perpetuated by a marble bust. No one who remembers what a fiery trial this phœnix city went through some years ago, and who now looks upon its stately streets and noble avenues, feels surprise at the existence of the Central Music Hall, or at the beautiful and commodious room which forms its chief apartment. Money can always be found for such a purpose, and our cousins do nothing by Hence it is that Chicago possesses an edifice halves. which, having regard to the object it serves, even mighty and wealthy London cannot match. Hall was well filled on the occasion of the Club Concert, but I was struck then, as on other occasions in the United States, with an absence of the "dress" effects to which Englishmen are accustomed. Our transatlantic kindred follow the custom of Continental audiences rather than that which prevails in the mother isle, their theatres and concert-rooms presenting, consequent upon the prevalence of morning dress, a more homely aspect than our own. By this practice justice is hardly done to the handsome interiors of American places of entertainment, but it may be urged, in reply, that the game of full dress is not worth the candle, and that it is better to leave the public at liberty to study their own convenience in a matter which should be so entirely personal as clothes. Before describing the performance of the Apollos, as a first-class pianist is by no means universally conceded. Some guides of popular opinion laud him all round; many others deny his possession of the high qualities required by an exponent of classic art. On which side Chicago amateurs range themselves as a majority I have no means of knowing. A moderately large audience attended the Recital in the Central Music Hall, and the performer's efforts were received with varying favour, regulated, as it were received with varying favour, regulated, as it does not not me, with perfect justice, and bespeaking for those present the possession of good taste and sound discernment. I had no difficulty in making out that Joseffy excels more in technical acquire-

That presently began to take a leading position. position he now distinctly holds, not in Chicago alone, but also in the-for America-adjacent cities of Milwaukie and Detroit. I have just read that Mr. Tomlins is no longer connected with the Apollo Club, but whatever the-to me unknown-reason for separation, we may be sure that he retains the rank to which his ability and industry entitle him. That the Club has lost a good conductor I know, since the man must be a fool who, after many years' experience of choral performances, cannot distinguish where a competent trainer has been at work. Speaking with the reserve imposed by limited observation, I must pronounce the Chicago chorus to be one of the best in America; further than this, its rendering of Rossini's and Mendelssohn's music on the occasion of my visit was absolutely the finest choral performance I heard during my stay in the country. The quality of the voices, their just intonation, firm attack, and precise execution satisfied me that here was unquestionable excellence such as might chal-lenge the verdict of any musical community in the world. Note should be taken of the fact that the work in hand was familiar, and I should not expect to find as much merit in the rendering of a novelty. But, after making all fair allowances, the chorus of the Apollo Club is a credit to the city and to American

The remark just made cannot be applied to the orchestra—a body of German performers who supply the wants of a large district of the lake region. They are not remarkably for merit, but, perhaps, are as good as can reasonably be expected under the circumstances. It should be said, also, that Mr. Tomlins is not an orchestral conductor in the degree that he is a chorus master. For the one position he lacks the training and experience which have fitted him for the other. Hence my criticism of this German band is made subject to fair allowance on an important score. The solo vocalists who assisted were Miss Emma Juch, some time ago heard in London, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, and Mr. Clarence Eddy. I can say nothing better of these artists as a body than that they were fair. Miss Juch is a capable soprano, likely to improve her position as time goes on, and Miss Winant has a good voice marred by an apparently invincible tremolo. As for the gentlemen, they were neither bad enough nor good enough to call for special remark.

With regard to other musical organisations in Chicago, I must be silent. The English reader would scarcely thank me for presenting him with a list of names, which is all I could do in the matter. Enough that the great metropolis of the north-west, possesses abundance of artistic life and has, to all appearance, a noble future before it. May Chicago go on and prosper.

In England praiseworthy attempts have lately been made to improve theatre music. There was, and still is, need of them. What person of taste has not found the obstreperous band, with its vulgar cornet, dear to the gallery, and squeaky fiddles an intolerable nuisance, and a serious drawback to his evening's enjoyment. The pieces performed are, in their way, little better; common-place dance-music, played, perhaps, on the royalty system, having the lion's share of preference. In this respect, Mr. Carl Armbruster is setting an example of reform at the Court Theatre, and has found one or two imitators else-Hence there is hope that, in time, we shall hark back to the position taken up by the theatrical orchestras forty or fifty years ago, when it was by no means unusual to hear movements from Haydn's acts of a piece. America, at present, is no better situated than England. Indeed, my first experience of an American theatre suggested that the position must be infinitely worse. Soon after arriving in New York I visited the pretty house in Madison Square, where the "Private Secretary" was having a successful "run." Looking for the orchestra in its usual place, I could discover no sign of such a thing, nor did any visible opening indicate that the players were immured under the stage. The architect of the theatre, I found, had carried out a bold idea, and made room for the band in a kind of Moorish gallery situated over the arch of the proscenium. The effect was pretty enough to the eye, curtains and hangings of Eastern stuff giving colour and finish to the picture. The orchestra, however, would have been better on the roof, or anywhere out of ear-shot. Its music was simply detestable-miserably out of tune, and wanting everything to recommend it. Moreover, the pieces performed were of the commonest kind-and this, be it remembered, in one of the most fashionable theatres of the Empire City. It is not surprising that, arguing from the known to the unknown, I formed a very low opinion of American theatrical music, which opinion, however, I soon had occasion greatly to modify. The orchestra at the Star Theatre, where Mr. Irving's company were then playing, was fairly good, and the selections performed had at least some reference to the piece represented on the stage. I found also a tolerably satisfactory state of things at one or two other houses in New York, while a representation of the "Beggar Student" at the Casino-a beautiful and comfortable theatrecompared favourably with that of similar works in London. It was no fault of the performers if the piece dragged somewhat; they did their best for it, and were in all respects up to the average-not a high one-of comic opera doings. The theatrical orchestras in Boston, as far as I know them, are of an ordinary character, neither very good nor very bad. No claim to artistic rank can be made by any of them, and the usual run of selections is in favour of dance music, played with more vigour than taste. In Washington I found a much worse state of things, and "than lowest depth a deeper still," in San Francisco, where the best I heard would hardly have been tolerated at a Dime Museum in the Eastern States. To my mind, therefore, it is clear that matters will bear mending in the United States as in England. As a matter of fact, it is far more important that there should be a change across the Atlantic than here. Our cousins are essentially a theatre-going people. Every "one-horse" town throughout the length and breadth of the land actually does possess, or aspires to have, an "Opera House," or an "Academy of Music"-so called on the lucus e non lucendo principle-where the citizens can meet on the common ground of a universal amusement. It is different with us. London and the great towns have flourishing theatres, but there are scores of minor places in which not one can be found, or, if found, is discovered to be more often shut than open. The theatre in America is therefore, as compared with the theatre in England, an institution of far greater and more wide-spread influence. It might be made a powerful means of spreading a taste for good music. Suppose, for example, that the manager of a theatre in a comparatively isolated place like Omaha or Denver were to form a small drawing-room orchestra, and place it under a competent man, with instructions to introduce good music little by little. In working reforms of this kind it is well to remember the proverb, "More haste, less speed." Public taste, whatever its character, should never be affronted by Symphonies, and other classical works, between the those who wish to raise it higher. Beginning with some of the lively and genial movements of Haydn's Symphonies and other works of the same school, and gradually proceeding to modern pieces in which, as in Gounod's "Meditation" or Schubert's "Ave Maria, attractive melody is predominant, the conductor would soon find public appetite coming round to the food so discreetly presented. The experiment has been tried in England with success. I believe that it would prove no less happy in America, and pre-sently transform every theatre into a place where popular musical training goes on. With regard to some other forms of music, I regret that opportunity was not given me of arriving at an opinion. Had the good ship Oregon reached New York two days earlier than she did, it would have been in my power to descant upon the bands of the Empire City, as they gave the stimulating effect of music to political demonstrations. After the Presidential election had been determined, it seemed as though the "organisations" in question had gone in for a complete and, no doubt, well earned rest. At any rate, I heard none of them. This is the less important because English amateurs remember the visit of Gilmore's band to their country, and their appearance at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere. They will have in mind, also, that the performance in question very creditably represented a popular form of American art. During the whole of my travels in the Union, I heard but two bands; the first being that attached to West Point Military Academy. One of the attractions for visitors to the beautiful and historic spot on the Hudson is the evening parade of the cadets. I shall not soon forget the pretty spectacle which, in company with Mr. Archibald Ramsden, of Leeds, I witnessed on one charming day late in the "Indian summer." From the far side of the picturesque parade-ground marched the band, playing as they came. Then the national colours were borne, under escort, to the centre of the open space, and presently the cadet battalion followed, by independent companies, forming up in line with admirable precision. The band played during the calling of the roll and inspection, but did not impress me as a very favourable specimen of its class, certainly not as entitled to the honour of a comparison with similar bodies in Europe. It wanted both the delicacy and precision which the best military bands on our side have little difficulty in attaining. My second observation in this class of music was made at New Orleans within the Exhibition building. For several days during my stay in the Crescent City no note of music had enlivened the few visitors to the "Great World's Show," as the newspapers, with questionable accuracy, were fond of calling it. At length a band connected with the town offered its services, and I went to hear-not only so, but to find a considerable amount of gratification. The performers, many of whom, I understood, were amateurs, executed the music of a well-selected programme in good style, especially a selection from "Lohengrin," wherein more than ordinary merit was shown. Let me add that, in the pretty town of Los Angeles (Cal.), a quartet of brass instruments playing outside a small theatre, or Dime Museum, gave me more satisfaction than many efforts of greater pretence. The performers were men of taste, and had been together long enough to secure perfect unity; they had full control humble musicians had at least one very attentive auditor during my stay in the place.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

SPITTA makes some curious comments upon the fact that Sebastian Bach was almost the only one of his race to marry a relative. They distinctly belong to the order of facts and observations which the German created, who, when required to describe a camel, evolved one from his inner consciousness. The ingenious biographer remarks:-" If we are right in regarding the marriage union of individuals from families not allied in blood as the cause of a stronger growth of development in the children, Bach's choice may signify that in him the highest summit of a development had been reached, so that his instinct disdained the natural way of attempting further improvement, and attracted him to his own race.' Spitta makes this very speculative observation well knowing that Bach took his second wife from a family other than his own, and that the theory upon which it is based is opposed rather than supported by the fact that Bach's first marriage produced the most gifted children.

Sebastian's work at Arnstadt came to an end before his marriage. We have seen that his relations with the Consistory and the choir were not happy, while it would seem that he allowed a desire for change to become known. This naturally brought applications for his services from various quarters, amongst them one from Mühlhausen, where the organ seat in the Church of St. Blasius was vacant. A succession of able men had made illustrious the post in question. None but a master of the highest rank would serve for it, and Bach, of all others, best answered the description. His appearance as a candidate at once drove all others from the field, and one trial of his ability so far convinced the Church council that shortly afterwards (May 24, 1707), Bach appeared before them to discuss the question of On this point an agreement was arrived at which failed materially to improve the intending bridegroom's worldly position. He consented to take eighty-five gulden, with-as an equivalent for certain land formerly attached to the office-three coombs of corn, two cords of wood, and three trusses of brushwood. In addition, it was the custom at Mühlhausen to present the organist annually with three pounds of fish. Bach made but one stipulation beyond the foregoing-he demanded the loan of a waggon to transport his furniture from the old place to the new, and the council graciously assented. All this took place while the parish of St. Blasius was under afflic-tion, caused by a great fire. We are told that "many members of the churchwardenry were houseless, and when the clerk of the council brought them the agreement to sign, pens and ink were lacking, and they declared that they had just then no thought for music, and that they were satisfied with the decisions of the council." These were not auspicious circumstances, but Bach's spirits were not affected by the spectacle of a parish in ruins. He cheerfully presented himself at the Arnstadt council house on June 29, to apply for dismissal, and give up the key of the organ. So eager was Bach to get away that he did not even stop to receive some arrears of salary, while, as though to accentuate this confidence in over their instruments, and used them with a degree the future, he pressed five gulden upon a needy of expression that exerted a powerful charm. These cousin then living in Arnstadt without any work to do. It was with high spirits that he shook the dust of the old town off his shoes; but not for ever. Three months later Bach returned to marry the "stranger maiden," by whose visits to their organ loft the worthy churchwardens were so scandalised.

The wedding took place (October 17, 1707) at Dorn-heim, a village less than a mile out of Arnstadt. Curious persons may still see in the parish register a record of the event. Its translation thus runs :-

"On October 17, 1707, the respectable Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, a bachelor, and organist to the church of St. Blasius at Mühlhausen, the surviving lawful son of the late most respectable Herr Ambrosius Bach, the famous town organist and musician of Zisenach, was married to the virtuous maiden, Maria Barbara Bach, the youngest surviving unmarried daughter of the late very respectable and famous artist, Herr Johann Michael Bach, organist at Gehren; here in our house of God, by the favour of our gracious ruler, after their banns had been read in Arnstadt."

No doubt, it was a "very respectable wedding," conducted with decorum, and in all respects worthy the blessing of the Church, and "the favour of our gracious ruler." On this point, however, history affords no assurance. We can only surmise that all went merry as a marriage bell, rung with true German Protestant sedateness-none the less so because one of Sebastian's relatives had died just before, and left him fifty gulden, which came in right handy for

" feathering the nest."

Once settled in his new home, Bach began work in earnest to improve music at St. Blasius. He strengthened the choir, introduced a large and more varied collection of works, and did not fail to make additions from his own pen. This, indeed, was his bounden duty, since Mühlhausen had a curious corporate custom affecting the organist of St. Blasius. It appears that the city business was managed by a council of forty-eight members, divided into three sections of sixteen; and that to obviate continuous party squabbles, these sections held power in turn for a year at a time. At every change it was the custom to hold a Church Festival, for which the occupant of the organ seat at St. Blasius had to provide a new work, his reward being its publication at the cost of the municipality. While concerned with all these duties, Bach did not forget an organist's obligation to agitate for a bigger and a better instrument. "Mr. Goss," said the Rev. Sydney Smith on an occasion of the kind, "do you know why you organists resemble a cab horse?" "No, I do not, Mr. Smith." "Because you are always wanting another stop." Bach wanted many stops, and sent into the church council a specification which must have astonished those worthy authorities not a little. In this, as in everything, the master was thorough-going. He asked for three new bellows, a thirty-two feet stop, a new bass trombone, a new Glockenspiel on the pedals, a sixteen feet bassoon, viol-de-gamba, and what not beside. All that he demanded the council conceded, yet Bach soon found that Mühlhausen was not likely to prove his permanent residence. A stranger to the town he was looked askance by the citizens, who cared little for imported talent; his new ways were not liked by sticklers for the ancient lines; while he failed to agree with the clergy, who, as often before and since, insisted on meddling with, and muddling matters they did not understand. When, therefore, the organist's post at Weimar became vacant, Bach resolved to visit the ducal court in view of obtaining it. On this occasion he combined pleasure with business; his purpose being to attend the second marriage of a clergyman who had officiated at his own wedding not long before. The more to honour this solemnity Bach composed a cantata, "The Lord hath been mindful of us," the performance of which, it is to be presumed, was conducted by him.

Bach obtained the Weimar appointment, and therehausen. The document in which he did this has been preserved in the archives of the town. The interest attaching to every word of so great a man must be our excuse for giving a complete translation:

"Magnifice, High and very noble (Burgomaster), High and very learned (town-councillors), and respected Gentlemen (citizens). Most gracious

Patroni and Gentlemen:-

"This is to represent to your Magnificenz, and to my highly esteemed patrons, who, of your grace, bestowed on me, your humble servant, the office. vacant a year since, of Organist to the Church of St. Blasius, and of your favour granted me a better subsistence, that at all times I desire to recognise your favours with obedient gratitude. But although I have always kept one end in view, namely, with all good will to conduct well-ordered church music to the honour of God, and in agreement with your desires, and otherwise to assist, as far as was possible to my humble ability, the church music which has grown up in almost all the parishes round, and which is often better than the harmony produced here, and to that end have obtained from far and wide, and not without expense, a good collection of the choicest church pieces, and no less have, as is my duty, laid before you the estimate of the defects necessary to be remedied in the organ, and at all times and places have with pleasure fulfilled the duties of my office. Still, this has not been done without difficulty, and at this time there is not the slightest appearance that things will be altered, although in the future at this church, even I have humbly to represent that, modest as is my way of life, with the payment of house-rent and other indispensable articles of consumption, I can with difficulty live.

"Now God has so ordered it that a change has unexpectedly been put into my hands, in which I foresee the attainment of a more sufficient subsistence and the pursuit of my aims as regards the due ordering of church music without vexation from others, since his Royal and Serene Highness of Saxe-Weimar has graciously offered me admission to his Court chapel and chamber music.

"In consequence of this privilege, I hereby, with obedience and respect, represent it to my most gracious patrons, and at the same time would ask them to take my small services to the church up to this time into favourable consideration, and to grant me the benefit of providing me with a good testimonial. If I can in any way farther contribute to the service of your church I will prove myself better in deed than in word so long as life shall endure.

"Most honourable gentlemen, most gracious patrons and gentlemen, your most humble servant, Johann Sebastian Bach."

The document above given was addressed "To all and each respectively of the very high and highlyesteemed gentlemen, the ministers of the Church of St. Blasius, the memorial of their humble servant.

No deduction unfavourable to Bach should be drawn from the fulsome style of this letter. The writer simply adopted the fashion of the day, besides which, the Germans were, and still are, fond of highsounding addresses and extravagant protestations of humility. We see from the contents that Bach had no quarrel with his lay superiors, but only with those "others" who vexed him in the discharge of his duties by continual interference. The Council reluctantly accepted their organist's resignation, stipulating that he should continue to direct the repair of the instrument. This Bach had no difficulty in promising, and so the great master left Mühlhausen, whither another member of his ubiquitous family, Johann Friedrich Bach, went to succeed him. Sebastian upon hastened to demand his dismissal from Mühl-lat once entered upon residence at Weimar, and remained there nine years-according to Spitta, "the period of his most brilliant activity as an organist and composer for the organ."

The biographer just referred to enters, after his wont, into many details regarding the Prince who now became Bach's master. These are interesting, as giving proof of the existence of thoroughly congenial surroundings. Duke Wilhelm Ernst was a staid, sober, God-fearing ruler; a staunch Lutheran, much given to religious exercises, but not a Puritan in the sense of considering art as inimical to religion. He was, indeed, well disposed to art, and, though not a fanatic for music, kept at his Court "sixteen welltrained musicians, who, dressed in the habit of heyducs, at times delighted his ear." Spitta remarks :- "The Duke had the deepest conviction that the religion of the Protestant Church was the first of human blessings, but that it did not exclude the other aspects of life in all its manifestations and relations, but merely concentrated them and raised them to a purer ideal. Artistic efforts within the jurisdiction of the Church must therefore have seemed to him something exceptionally praiseworthy and deserving of promotion, particularly when he observed what a gifted musician this was who applied the greater portion of his splendid powers to the problem. On his views were moulded those of most of the men who surrounded him, and Bach could at once be convinced that his music would meet with sympathetic appreciation, if only because it was church music." The master, entering upon his new position under such conditions, must have felt that his lines had at length fallen to him in pleasant places—the more, no doubt, because he was, comparatively speaking, well paid. His work was two-fold—viz., that of Court Organist and chamber musician. This involved presiding at the organ in church and playing an instrument, dressed as a heyduc, at the ducal entertainments. For the double work he received a salary of 156 gulden 15 groschen, raised, in three years time, to 225 gulden, and, a year later, still higher. It appears that he took the clavichord and the violin in the Court band, of which he speedily rose to be leader, or concertmeister. The organ it became his duty to play is described as a small instrument, having two manuals of eight and nine stops respectively, with a powerful pedal of seven stops including a "32 feet." This specification, as regards balance between pedals and manuals, seems out of all proportion, but probably Bach did not think so. With him the pedal organ could hardly be too full of resources.

At Weimar Bach met, and formed a friendship with, Johann Gottfried Walther, an organist and musician best known now by his "Musical Lexicon" —the first work of its kind. Walther had, so to speak, counterpoint in his blood. He was the very incarnation of musical science, and could perform the most astounding feats in canon writing, such as giving a cantus firmus to the pedals, and accompanying it, on the manuals, with a two-part canon on the octave at the distance of a crotchet. Such a man and Bach would naturally gravitate one towards the other. Bach's natural genius, however, was proof against any temptation to his friend's mere ingenuity. "Although," says Spitta, "he had much greater ingenuity than Walther, he never allows himself to be carried away by it to the injury of the ideal, but remains grand and simple even through the most complicated forms." In other words, while Bach mastered forms, he did not allow them, as did Walther, to master him. So far did the intimacy of the two men proceed that Bach stood godfather to one of story which may be apropos, there being good reason for concluding that the "friend" who takes part in it is Walther. On this authority we are to believe that Bach became rather puffed up by his prodigious ability in playing at sight, and boasted to the friend in question that he really believed he could play anything. To test the point, Walther "invited him to breakfast one morning, and laid on the desk of his instrument, besides other pieces, one which at first sight looked insignificant. Bach came in, and, according to his custom, walked straight to the instrument, partly to play and partly to look through the pieces which lay on the desk. While he was turning over the pages and trying them, his host went into another room to prepare breakfast. In a few minutes Bach came, in its turn, to the piece prepared for him and began to play it, but not far from the beginning he came to a standstill. He studied it, began again and again, came to a stop. "No," he exclaimed, rising to leave the instrument, while his friend was laughing to himself in the next room, "no one can play everything at sight; it is not possible." A somewhat similar story is told of Haydn and Mozart, showing how the younger master set a trap for the elder, into which he did not fall, for when Haydn found his hands at the extremes of the scale and a note to be struck in the middle, he took it with his prominent nose. The Bach anecdote may be apocryphal, as that of Haydn-Mozart almost undoubtedly is, but it points to the origin of the quarrel between the two Weimar masters. The dispute, though we know nothing of its precise ground, must have been a bitter one, since Walther treats Bach very scurvily in his Lexicon, dismissing him, indeed, with what Spitta rightly calls "a worse than meagre article.'

Fairly settled in his new home, Bach began to work hard upon organ compositions and in his own development as an organist. Mattheson, writing in 1716, said: "I have seen things by the famous organist, Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, of Weimar, which, both for church use and for keyed instruments, are certainly so conceived that we cannot but highly esteem the man." Spitta adds: "His works, of which the technical difficulties remain unsurpassed even at the present day, exist to testify that as time went on he achieved the most unlimited mastery over the mighty instrument; and as with him the external form was always the handmaid merely of an inward purpose, we may conclude that the demands made by them upon executive skill never rise to the utmost height of his own technical capabilities as exhibited in free improvisation when display was the first object, or when trying some new organ." At this time Bach passed under the influence of Italian art, with which he was thrown in contact by his duties as chamber The Italian masters were then very musician. popular at German courts for good and sufficient reasons, such as the lucidity and elegance of their music, in these respects so far ahead of all other. Bach seems to have been greatly attracted by the sonata and concerto forms, and few amateurs need telling that he spent a good deal of time in transcribing Italian compositions of these kinds for the organ. He thus arranged no fewer than sixteen of Vivaldi's violin concertos, treating one twice in this manner. The process was something very different from a mere transfer to the repertory of another instrument. "By giving more movement to the bass," says his best biographer," by adding animation to the inner parts, by supplementing the solo passages of the violins with counterpoint; by resolution of the Walther's children. Eventually, however, they became estranged—no doubt on some point of musical principle or procedure. As to this Forkel tells a genuine work for the clavier, and at the same time essentially added to the musical value of as to my station (work and pay) I will present mythe piece." From adapting Italian concertos, the master soon went on to original composition in the same form. Hence his works for the organ, which have a slow movement interposed between the customary prelude and fugue. In some of these there are indications of the Italian "binary" form—rudimentary ones, it is true, but definite enough to show that Bach was attracted by the idea of using two contrasted subjects in the same movement. The whole question of the influence exercised upon him by Italian music is most interesting, and has been treated by Spitta with characteristic, but not undue, The nature and extent of that influence shows what might have happened had Bach, like his great contemporary, Handel, resided for a time in Italy, and otherwise moved in the world of music outside Germany. There is reason to believe that he had not the great adaptability of Handel, but we may safely conclude that a larger and more varied experience would have affected his music in the direction of popularity, and, perhaps, have increased its actual worth.

If our master did not venture beyond the boundaries of his fatherland, he made, during the Weimar period, many excursions within them. There were autumn holidays in those times, and Bach was wont to visit courts and towns for more or less of professional reasons. Amongst other places, he visited Cassel, where a newly-restored organ and a musical Crown Prince attracted him. Bach, we are told, played the organ to the Prince, who was so amazed by his execution that he took a ring from his finger and presented it to the master. "His feet flew over the pedal-board as if they had wings, and the ponderous and ominous tones pierced the ear of the hearer like a flash of lightning or clap of thunder; and if the skill of his feet alone earned him such a gift, what would the Prince have given him had he used his hands as well?" Halle, the birthplace of Handel, also came within one of Bach's autumnal tours, his object there being to try a large, new organ of sixtythree sounding stops, belonging to the Church of the Holy Virgin. He liked the instrument, and as the post of Organist happened to be vacant, serious thoughts of applying for it occupied his mind. In point of fact, he actually interviewed the authorities to inform them that he was disposed to accept the appointment, in view of which he remained at Halle for some time, and composed a Cantata there by way of formal proof of ability, though hardly could a test have been required in the case of so renowned an artist. Soon after his return to Weimar, the Chapter at Halle sent him a "vocation," or call, to which Bach, writing under date January 14, 1714, made answer as follows :-

"Most noble, most respected Sir,-I have duly received your favour with the vocation in duplicate. I am greatly obliged to you for sending it, as I esteem it a happiness that the whole of your most noble Collegium condescend to call me, your humble servant, who had determined to follow the guidance of God shown in this vocation. Still, most honoured Sir, I beg you not to take it amiss that I could not hitherto notify to you my final resolution by reason that I have not yet received my final dismission, and (2) because in one or two things I should be glad of some alteration, both as to the salary and also as to the service, all of which shall be specified in writing Meanwhile, I remit to you one exemplar; this week. and since I have not yet received my entire dismission, I pray you, most honoured Sir, not to take it ill that still at this time, I cannot engage myself, by subscribing my name or otherwise, before I am actually

The master's second letter, formulating his requirements, has not been preserved, but we know that the Halle Chapter refused to grant them, and wrote This he did; whereupon it was said by the disappointed authorities that Halle had been simply made a cat's-paw to draw from the Weimar Grand Duke an increased salary. How false this was, and tunity of showing.

MY TEACHERS.

Nowadays if one ventures so far to depart from the conventional decorum of journalism as to express decided views on a subject, or to lay down the law in any save the vaguest and most general terms, one is instantly challenged by someone holding the opposite opinion. There must be two sides to every question, but discussion is apt to be an anti-climax to the author and a bore to the reader. At the same time, the maxim of audi alteram partem is just, and I myself would be the last to claim the title of Sir Oracle. Wherefore I intend to set a noble example of selfsacrifice.

Some readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES may remember that a few months ago I gave in these columns a fancy portrait of the typical music-pupil-a portrait drawn, I solemnly protest, from actual experience. A young lady claiming—with what justice others may decide—to be a representative specimen of her class, has since communicated to me en revanche her experience of music-teachers, and at her request I publish the narrative in her own words, refraining from all comment.-F. C.]

I think much of the disheartening toil and failure of which some music-teachers complain is their own fault, and arises from their misunderstanding or ignoring what is required of them. There are certain enthusiasts who, because they happen to have had a Conservatorium education, fancy that they have a mission to try and make all their pupils into virtuosi, when all that these poor sufferers demand is to be enabled to respond to the eternal appeal of the drawing-room, "Do play us something, Miss Smith!" I myself, thank heaven, do not quail now before that dread demand, but what have I not gone through to attain to that state!

I believe mamma taught me my notes when I was about ten years old, but I have no remembrance of the fact. I first began really to learn the piano when I went to boarding-school at the age of thirteen. A governess gave some five-and-twenty of us halfan-hour's lesson twice a week, and with all that out of service. And so soon as we shall be agreed raw material to experiment upon she must certainly have found the best mode of grounding beginners. She was, however, rather listless and apathetic in her manner and I fear her heart was not in her work. I did not stay under her very long, for my health was too delicate for boarding-school. I had a governess at home for some time after that and my education pursued the usual routine. But there were always difficulties over my music lessons, though I am sure I cannot imagine why. I think we were peculiarly unfortunate in our governesses. One was a stout elderly lady, whose great recommendation was that she had known Chopin. Her enemies said that he had lodged for a week in a boarding-house which she kept. I never heard her play-I do not know anyone who did-but she was very good tempered and used to praise my playing very much. But she always used to be taken "fainty" as she called it, at the end of the lesson and had to be restored with two glasses of sherry and a sandwich. This was submitted to for some time, but at last she got to require three glasses and then mamma thought a change of teachers would be desirable. Then we had a young lady from the Royal Academy who was rather nice, but she was always getting up a concert or a recital and worrying us to take tickets, besides wanting to rehearse her pieces before me. Mamma said that she thought too much of herself and too little of her pupils, and so we changed again. I was now old enough and advanced enough to have a master, so enquiries for one were instituted. We were then residing in a country town and it appeared that there were only two professors of music available. One was an old man, the parish organist, and the other a quite young man just returned from Leipzig, where he was reported to have received a brilliant musical education. On enquiry it appeared that his terms were considerably lower than those of the aforesaid organist, and accordingly mamma determined to patronise him. Mr. N. was certainly a beautiful player and a most painstaking teacher, but he had certain drawbacks. Firstly, he was nervous and shy in his manner, which is most objectionable in a master. Then he was too exacting and over-critical, never seeming satisfied with anything that I did. If I played ever so correctly he would complain that some note was not held down long enough (as if that mattered so long as it sounded rightly), or that I played in too level a tone, or used the pedal wrongly, or fingered improperly, or something, until I got quite impatient and longed to cry, "What does it matter so long as the piece goes smoothly?" Then, too, his pieces were always so dreadfully classical and ineffective. If he ever gave me any modern music at all it was by some German composer with an unpronounceable name, and so bristling with accidentals that when once learned it never would keep learnt, but got fresh mistakes in it every time one played it. But the worst was his persuading me to play studies. wanted me to practise scales and finger-exercises, but there I flatly rebelled. I had done with the nursery, thank you! He declared that he played them every day himself, but I took the liberty of quietly disbelieving him. Still, the studies were bad enough. Mr. N. assured me that they would improve my touch and execution; I never found that they did, and they certainly did not improve my temper. To think of the time I wasted over those dreadful things, when I might just as well have been practising something that I could play to people! Six mortal times a day did I wade through that tangle of notes, and by next lesson it was as full of wrong during my own playing by their whispering and tittering notes and things as ever. As I could only spare an hour a day for practice, I thought it too bad to waste release from my toils; but after six months we again changed our place of residence, and I my master. Still, I fancy I did make progress with Mr. N., and should have liked him very much had it not been for the above-mentioned drawbacks, and also a way he had of seeming uncomfortable all the time of the lesson, shrinking or wincing when I played a wrong note. This, if not an affectation, was an unpleasant mannerism, besides showing inferior breeding.

Many of my subsequent changes of teachers were caused by our frequent changes of residence, and of course there were spaces during which my studies were neglected. I think the next was MI. R., an energetic and rather hot-tempered man. He used to walk up and down the room or stand away against the mantelpiece while I played, and shout out when anything went wrong; but he would never correct me, however long it took me to find out my mistake. I think this was a very good plan. When I was stupid, which happens occasionally to everyone, I suppose, he did not scruple to call me names, even "Stupid head" and "Wooden fingers"; but I am not easily made nervous, I am glad to say. Hischief fault was that he gave his pupils scarcely anything but his own compositions. They were nice drawing-room pieces enough, but one does like a change. After him I had a delightful man, Signor A. He was not at all one's idea of an Italian, being tall, slender, and fair, with a full beard like floss silk, and oh! the most heavenly pair of blue eyes. He taught some of his own compositions, too, but they were soft and dreamy as himself—"Baiser d'amour," "Battements du cœur," "Les soupirs," and the like. He would sit down to the piano and play one of these pieces so tenderly, with his eyes upturned towards. me all the time with a pathetic, beseeching look that reminded me exactly of my darling Skye terrier, Nelly, who died the year before. Somehow mamma took a strong dislike to Signor A., and after I had had six lessons made some excuse for discontinuing. The next was a German, Herr Z., a very singular person. He was one of those crashing, smashing players, and used to give me pieces far too difficult, all octaves and big chords, such as he loved to play himself. He persuaded mamma to pay him for the twelve lessons half way through the term, as his wife lay on a bed of sickness. Then at the next lesson he came in tears, and related how he had become security for a friend, who had run away and left him Unless he could raise ten pounds by next Thursday he would be thrown into a debtors' prison. Mamma never can resist a person who weeps, so she gave him the ten pounds, and we never saw him again, nor Uncle Henry's overcoat and umbrella either, which were hanging in the hall, and which, in his distress, Herr Z. must have mistaken for his

About this time we came to live in London, and economy being an object, it was suggested that I should go to a class. Accordingly I was entered at the South Belgravia College of Music, where pupils were promised two lessons per week in piano or singing, besides an hour's class harmony and a lecture, all for two guineas a quarter. This was not a success, for after all one hardly got money's worth. The piano lessons were only fifteen minutes in length, and one was expected to sit out the lessons of two other girls, as if that could do any good. So I had the tedium of gazing at two dreadful ill-dressed objects of girls for half-an-hour while they stumbled through their pieces, and then of being disturbed as they doubtless exchanged ill-natured remarks upon my appearance and performance. The weekly leemy time thus, and should at last have demanded a ture was usually a dull and uninteresting affair-at least. I only went once, for the room was so stuffy and crowded that it gave me a headache. But the harmony class was really too ridiculous for anything. We learnt first a quantity of hard names for the notes, such as supertonic and submediant, as if A, B, and C were not far more convenient and easy to remember. Then there were mysterious figures which represented chords, how or why I do not know, nor what was the good of them when they were done. I only remember one thing distinctly of it all, partly because it was so frequently repeated, and partly because it seemed so utterly incomprehensible and meaningless as to have the effect on my mind of a spell or prophecy in a foreign language. This was, "A chord of five-three becomes in the first inversion a chord of six-three." At last I summoned courage to ask the professor, one day after he had given up as hopeless the correction of my exercise, what influence all this could have upon my playing, or what benefit I was likely to derive from it? replied (in a moment of irritation, I admit), "Not the slightest." And, as I shared his opinion, I left the College at the end of the term.

I was now eighteen, and my education was nearly completed. Aunt Jane, therefore, generously offered to pay for a dozen finishing lessons for me with one of the very best London professors. That year Herr Blitz, the great Icelandic pianist, was all the rage. I had heard him play, and imagining that he would suit the purpose, mamma and I called upon him. He was one of those regular foreigners whose clothes seem all creases and faces all hair; he had a pair of very staring light grey eyes, made more staring by almost childish good-humour and ill-bred brusquerie. Instead of asking me to play, he took my music case from me, and, after rapidly fluttering over the leaves of the half-dozen pieces it contained, uttered some exclamation-in Icelandic, I presume-which sounded like clearing his throat, assuming at the same time a strange, half-despairing expression of countenance. He then asked me to play him the scale of G minor, of all things in the world, first in single notes and then in octaves; and after I had complied to the best of my ability, he asked me several questions about keys, and time, and things of that sort, which I confess I never did or shall understand. Having done this, he rose and - without hearing me play, to mamma, in the odious broken English which I will not attempt to reproduce:-

"My artistic position enables me to be frank with you, madam, and to tell you the naked truth, un-pleasant though it may be. Your daughter has simply wasted the most valuable seven years of her life, and will never play so as to give herself or others pleasure. She has neither knowledge, technique, nor talent "—the monster!—" and for me to give her lessons would be robbing you, wasting her time, and making myself unhappy."

"But, Herr Blitz," gasped mamma, almost staggering under this outrageous speech, "I assure you she plays very nicely indeed. You have not heard her yet. If you only would. Of course, I don't mean that she plays like a professional, but her playing has been greatly admired by all our friends," regaining courage to stand up for me as she went on.

"Then in that case I will withdraw my opinion to the contrary," replied the hateful man, grinning; 'and I should advise you to, as you say in English, let well alone.

"But I thought, if you would give her a little finish," began poor mamma (as if I would have taken a lesson of him after such rudeness).

"I should have to give her a little beginning first," he answered, ringing for the servant to show us out; and I regret to be obliged to decline.

"I think there is perhaps some misunderstanding," I ventured to put in, wishing to give a little sting in return before leaving; "Herr Blitz is not to suppose that I wish to qualify for a mere music teacher.

Quite unmoved, he bowed us out with the reply-"Every lady should be able to teach two things to her children-the Lord's Prayer and the elements of music.

I need not pursue my experiences; they have always been the same. I have, however, found the proper course to pursue now that I am old enough to think and act for myself. Every year I collect a few pieces which have struck me on hearing them, and then I take half-a-dozen lessons of anybody who will undertake to teach me those and nothing else. So I get what I want, and at least avoid being imposed upon. I play dear mamma to sleep every evening, and most of the girls I know are jealous of my playing, so it cannot be very bad; I have even played at two Fancy Fairs and a Working Men's Temperance Concert. I find my piano a great solace and pastime for the winter evenings, so I do give pleasure both to myself and others, whatever Herr Blitz may say.

ONCE more the vexed question of Musical Pitch has cropped up, the initiative on the present occasion having been taken by the Royal Academy of Music. Whether any tangible result is likely to accrue from this re-opening of a subject which has been discussed at various previous times to the point of exhaustion, we may be permitted to doubt, judging by the light of past experience. It is a great thing, no doubt, to possess freedom from State control in all matters relating to art, but even freedom has its disadvantages, and we present a laughable spectacle to foreign nations by indulging in floods of idle talk on a subject which with them may be settled with a stroke of the pen. On one point there is general agreement; the present confusion, as regards pitch, is excessively inconvenient, and uniformity would be hailed as a boon by all classes of musicians. When we find an eminent firm like Messrs. Broadwood and Sons stating officially that they adopt three varying standards of pitch, the Diapason Normal C, 518, the Society of Arts or Stuttgart C, 528, and the Philharmonic C, 538, the absurdity of the situation must be evident to the meanest comprehension. But directly the question comes, in which direction shall we move, a very Babel of jarring opinions results, and the real difficulties in the way of any settlement are not approached owing to theoreticians quarrelling among themselves. This was amusingly illustrated at the meeting convened by the Royal Academy at St. James's Hall, on the 20th ult. The first resolution, affirming that a lowering of our pitch was desirable, was carried all but unanimously. But when it was further proposed that we should adopt the Diapason Normal, many present pronounced for the Society of Arts standard, which was the outcome of a serious discussion twenty-five years ago; while others declared the difficulties attending any change insuper-Now it may be admitted that, from the scientific point of view, neither of the standards named is thoroughly satisfactory, because both are arbitrary and artificial. But it is quite obvious that any settlement of the question in this country must be the result of compromise, and the French pitch being firmly established by authority in a large section of musical Europe, commends itself to impartial observers as the most reasonable under all circumstances. The vast majority of vocalists entertainments, however, constantly come before us: the initiative then taken has not been generally followed, and the muddle is even worse now than it was at that time. The committee appointed by the St. James's Hall meeting to consider and report on the matter will, of course, make some recommendation, but we are far from sanguine that this newly planted tree will bear any fruit. Nor, supposing we had a Minister of Fine Arts sincerely desirous of acting in the interests of music in making his sovereign decrees, could he hope to learn what is needed by questioning those most interested in the subject. Theoretical chaos and practical difficulty surround the matter of pitch, and seem to bar the way to a reasonable arrangement.

FROM the many "curiosities of musical criticism" now in our possession we extract the following. In a notice of the performance of Gounod's "Redemption" at a Church Service, where it is said that it "took the place of the anthem," we are told, "For the present occasion the prologue is taken at the opening of the service, and the introduction to the prophetic choir, or some other interlude is taken during the collection, while the performance is otherwise shortened by leaving out orchestral scenas." The appearance of Jesus to the Apostles "makes another demand upon the tenor in the top notes of benediction; when the Saviour ascends there is another easy chorus of good harmony, 'Unfold, ye portals everlasting," and the accompaniment to the work, by the organist, "was characterised by great judgment in the subdued tones that supported the solos, and the play of suitable pipes according to the sentiments of the choruses." Another critic, writing upon Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," says "the composition is better than we remember for some years, each class of voice being well represented, and the balance being as nearly equal as possible, though one or two bass voices might improve it." The chorus, "Let all men praise the Lord," is described as "a stately alternation of hymnic strophes and symphonies"; and the band, on the occasion, was led by the Conductor to the Society "with the first violin." A leading paper of the district treats a Choral Service at the Parish Church as a Concert, saying "The programme consisted of responses, hymns, canticles, psalms and anthems, and the entertainment was conducted by the Choirmaster." In the notice of an Organ Recital, the Overture to "Athalie," it is recorded, was given by the organist "in all its intense grandeur and delightful phraseology"; and at the conclusion of the performance "every one present left with feelings of sincere regret." And, although we have by no means exhausted our collection, we conclude with a criticism upon a young violin player, who, in addition to the rendering of a Fantasia, gave a piece called "Intro-duzione a Gavot." The "manipulation of his instrument," we are informed, "was almost perfect, its tones being fully and clearly produced, the appoggiatura being extremely delicate and sweet."

WHATEVER truth there may be in the opinion held by many who desire the healthy spread of music, that bad as well as good compositions should be included in a "popular" programme, it seems strange that any person should believe in the benefit of admitting items in a Concert which cannot be classed under the head of music at all. Notices of such examiners.

are in favour of lowering the existing stan-dard, and their views have been carried into carefully organised, and "kindly patronised" by a effect at certain times, notably when the Oratorio lady, whose presence, we presume, must be accepted Concerts were established sixteen years ago. But as a guarantee of her approval of the scheme. In the newspaper critique upon this Concert, after saving that the various pieces were well rendered, "showing unmistakable talent in the vocal, instrumental, and recitative parts"-whatever this may mean-we are told that a singer "created roars of laughter with his Irish song, 'Macnamara's band,' whistling his own accompaniments on a pair of bellows"; and that in his next contribution to the programme he caused "great amusement by requesting the audience to join in the chorus, which was sung so fast and was such a confused jumble as to render it absolutely impossible to do so." Unconsciously, of course, comic effects can be introduced in a really serious performance, as an instance of which we are informed that on one occasion the "' Hallelujah Chorus' was marred by the gentleman in charge of the drums, who, probably wishing to have a solo to himself, was intercepted by one of the bass, and both seemed to strive which could hold out the longest in the rest at the end, and when their services were not required." But this "gentleman in charge of the drums," although throwing discredit upon the Concert, was not engaged for this purpose, like the vocalist who performed upon the bellows; and any degradation to the art, therefore, rested not upon those who framed the programme. There is a man who plays upon a coffeepot in the streets; but we have not heard that he has yet been secured for a "Popular Concert."

> WE have not a word to say against Musical Examinations. They have done, and are still doing, a very large amount of good in directing the studies of young pupils towards the works of the classical, instrumental, and vocal composers, and in spreading a knowledge of the true principles of the art. But since we last made a few observations in this journal upon the subject of "Coaches," many facts have come to our knowledge which, in the interest of the cause, should not be ignored. We happen to know that in several instances students "pass" these ordeals-at least in the theory of music-solely by answering questions in words, the meaning of which they are never taught, simply because it is presumed that the examiner will be satisfied with this conventional reply. It is part of the business of a "Coach" to find out what institution he is preparing his pupil for, so that he may procure former examination papers as a guide to the questions almost certain to be asked. Of course, the remedy would be to require that a candidate shall not only explain certain chords, but point out specimens of them in a piece at first sight; for it is obvious that instruc-tions from the cleverest "Coach" would be of no service in such a case as this. "Dear me," said a service in such a case as this. Dear he, said a college professor at an examination, "has no one ever heard of Lucifer?" "Oh yes," said the most advanced of the class, "Lucifer was the man that started the German Reformation." Now if this hopeful pupil had luckily happened to get hold of the right name, he might perhaps have been thought very clever, although it is certain that he would have known no more of the matter under discussion. So, at a musical examination, when a candidate "passes" by explaining chords with the right words, and yet could not, if asked, tell the signification of these words (which we can positively say has been the case), the pupil is satisfied, and the "Coach" triumphs, but a fraud has been practised on the

WE have often given scraps of news from continental and American journals respecting passing musical events in England; and as few men know their own affairs so well as their neighbours seem to do, we are not surprised that much of the information we read in these periodicals published at a long distance should perfectly astonish those who live on the spot. One of these paragraphs, which we commented upon at the time, told us that the banjo had now become one of the most fashionable instruments in English drawing-rooms. Never having heard a composition for the banjo either at a public or private Concert, we had the curiosity at once to make enquiries on the subject, and cannot find that this very decisive statement made in an American paper is borne out by fact. It is evident, however, that in the United States the epidemic is rapidly spreading, for in a New York musical journal a semi-humorous paragraph appears expressing a hope that some specific may be discovered for curing "Banjo on the brain." The disease, it is said, is raging most furiously among the higher classes, especially among the ladies, many of whom are nearly wild. Piano dealers are getting frightened, for many are resigning that instrument in favour of the banjo; and if a cure can be found, everybody will buy-" Fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, aunts, and uncles, next-door neighbours, people overhead who wish to sleep, and people underneath who can't." In an American periodical now before us we see the advertisements of three makers of these instruments—one tells us that all the leading banjoists use his "world-renowned Parlor, Concert, and Orchestral Banjos"; another that he is "Banjo Maker for the Profession, Experts and Teachers," and the third that he is "indorsed by the profession as the Banjo Maker of the West." We have searched in vain for any catalogue of works patronised by the performers upon this instrument; but that, as a rule, they are resolved to move with the times may be sufficiently proved by the following remarkable paragraph: "A young lady in Philadelphia has had several Wagner selections arranged for the banjo."

A LETTER from Mr. Charles Hallé has been addressed to the London papers, the purport of which needs not the writer's powerful pleading to enlist the sympathies of all musicians. Stephen Heller, the eminent composer, whose name, as Mr. Hallé says, is a "household word to all lovers of music," has become almost totally blind, and the pursuit of his art, his sole happiness, is henceforth closed to him. Although never resident in this country, his works are well known, and thoroughly appreciated throughout England; and when we say that, presuming the necessary funds can be obtained, it is hoped that a small annuity may be purchased to smooth the declining years of the afflicted artist, there can be little doubt that such announcement will meet with a ready and liberal response. Subscriptions to the "Heller Testimonial Fund," will be received by Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand, London, and a committee, composed of Sir Frederic Leighton, P.R.A., Mr. Robert Browning, and Mr. Charles Hallé, has been formed to carry into effect an undertaking which we earnestly trust will result in the presentation of a fitting tribute of gratitude and esteem from musical England.

HANDEL BI-CENTENNIAL FESTIVAL.

ONLY for the most serious reasons should the ordinary course of a musical Festival be interfered with. These things have their order, which, in time, acquires the nothing worse. But the directors of the Crystal Palace were quite justified in anticipating, this year, the solemnity which, but for the occurrence of the bi-centenary of Handel's birth, would still be twelve months ahead. It was almost an obligation upon them to "keep the feast," and, with their wealth of resources, bring to a climax a long course of celebration. They did this, and did it well; they found the public in sympathetic mood, and the result was a gratifying success all round. The country of Handel's adoption thus discharged her plain duty, and preserved her honour, for it would have been humiliating had not the most imposing demonstration taken place in the land of his labours and his final rest.

So complete is the organisation of the Sydenham Festivals that the managers have only to touch a spring and the whole machinery begins to work with smoothness. This time extra precautions were taken within the department ruled over by Mr. Manns, and, as a result, nearly a thousand new voices were engaged, replacing others which, it is in many cases to be presumed, had lost their power and freshness. Moreover, both the number and scope of the rehearsals were increased. Sir M. Costa never considered a trial of "The Messiah" music necessary. He had an extraordinary degree of reliance on himself and his performers—enough, at any rate, to warrant him in defying the whole chapter of accidents. The result, it must be said, never convicted him of undue temerity. Mr. Manns is a different person altogether. He believes in obtaining as strong a guarantee against ill-fortune as possible, hence "The Messiah" choruses were as carefully prepared as the less familiar ones in the Selection. This work went on in town and country for some time previous to the holding of the Festival; while, as regards the orchestra, the professional element was strengthened-also a wise and prudent step in the nature of an investment certain to yield profit. The following solo vocalists were engaged: Madame Albani, Madame Valleria, Mrs. Clara Suter, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Barrington Foote, Mr. F. King, Mr. Bridson, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley. Of these, it will be observed, all save two—Madame Valleria and Madame Trebelli—are British subjects by birth.

The composition of the band and chorus rightfully claims attention, though differing little, it may be, from former procedure in this regard. There were 100 first violins, headed by Mr. C. Jung; 102 second violins (Mr. A. Reynolds); 61 violas (Mr. Krause); 60 violoncellos (Mr. R. H. Reed); 53 double basses (Messrs. Progatzky and White); 4 piccolo flutes, 11 flutes, 16 oboes, 10 clarinets, 8 bassoons, 6 trumpets, 4 cornets, 14 horns, 9 trombones, 3 ophicleides, 3 pairs of drums, 2 side drums, and 1 bass drum. To this battalion of instruments has to be added the great organ played by Mr. A. J. Eyre; the grand total being 468. The majority were, of course, supplied by London, but the great provincial towns sent up a goodly representation. The chorus, numbering hard upon 3,000 voices, including 672 sopranos, was also largely drawn from metropolitan sources, with a fair contingent of about 770 voices from the rest of Great Britain. It thus appears that the national character of the celebration was not lost sight of, though some may argue that London had more than its fair share of amateurs in the orchestra. The fact may be as stated, but we should not forget that a metropolitan choralist costs less than one brought up from the country; and that the Festival-to put the matter delicately-is not unconnected with an enterprise having shareholders who expect dividends. The personnel of the Festival should not be dismissed without reference to the experienced gentlemen who again came forward to assist the Crystal Palace people as stewards and in other capacities. Many of these were officially connected with the late Sacred Harmonic Society, and it is pleasant to note with what readiness they take upon themselves an onerous if familiar task.

The general rehearsal held on Friday, the 19th ult., was not so largely attended as on some former occasions—a fact that damped the hopes of not a few who wished the Festival well. It then seemed that the ill luck of the musical season would extend to its greatest event, but, as will in due course appear, the result proved better than our fears. Mr. Manns, who was a model of punctuality all force of a law, and to break it is to cause confusion, if through, had his army of performers in their places precisely at noon, and started the rehearsal with two choruses
—"Hallelujah" and "Amen"—from "The Messiah."
This, we need not say, is the regular practice. It serves to test the ensemble with familiar music, while giving the audience the pleasure that comes from the grandest examples of Handel's art. The test, let us add, was eminently satisfactory; showing an admirable balance of parts and fine quality of tone. Where all are so good it is invidious to particularise, but place aux dames, the sopranos made a powerful impression by their mingled strength and sweetness.

From the "Messiah" selections, Mr. Manns proceeded to the works chosen for performance on the second day, nearly all of which were rehearsed: the exceptions being those set down for Madame Albani, who was not present Much interest attended the compositions for orchestra alone: the audience receiving both the Concerto for two orchestras, and the Violin Sonata in A, with great favour, deserved not less by their execution than by their character. The vocal solos were also much applauded; above all The vocal solos were also much applauded; above all those sung by Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, and Madame Valleria. The rehearsal ended with eight numbers from "Israel in Egypt," a liberal allowance of Handel's double choruses being always expected by the public. There is no need to enlarge upon these matters in a paragraph devoted to mere preparatory exercises, especially as Mr. Manns severely acted up to the idea of a rehearsal, stopping the performers often and repeating passages no less carefully than he would have done had he and his multitude been alone. One result of the prolonged trial was to make the least sanguine confident of a good performance. Both chorus and orchestra came up to the desired mark, the former showing, if anything, an advance upon previous festivals. Indeed, it was wonderful to note the steadiness and precision of those 3,000 voices, the firmness of their attack, and the unity of all their movements.

Despite dull and threatening weather, indications of a large attendance at "The Messiah" performance were obvious at the railway stations and along the road to the Crystal Palace on the 22nd ult. It was clear that the fidelity of the public to the sacred oratorio had not yielded a bit to newer and diverse attractions. These signs were far from belied by the figures afterwards published, the number of persons who passed the turnstiles showing an advance upon those present during the corresponding day The attendance had, moreover, the merit of punctuality; and Mr. Manns gave the signal for beginning, not only with all his performers in front of him, but nearly all his audience behind. Under these happy circumstances, the overture to "The Messiah"—so seldom heard apart from the disturbance caused by late arrivals, was listened to in peace and comfort. So good a beginning gave favourable augury, which subsequent proceedings justified, since a smoother and more equal rendering of Handel's masterpiece has seldom come under our observation. Manns's reading of the work departed nowhere from tradition, and differed very slightly indeed from that adopted by Sir Michael Costa. In at least one of the few changes there was no improvement. It will be remembered that Costa made a somewhat prolonged pause before entering upon the magnificent finale to "All we like sheep," thus enhancing by previous silence the effect of the stately bass lead, "And the Lord hath laid on Him." Mr. Manns observed no pause, but went straight on. We distinctly prefer Costa's perceptiveness to his in this particular case. The choral numbers were, without exception, well given; and all the familiar effects, so eagerly anticipated, came in due course. "For unto us" went steadily, with an amazing outburst on the "Wonderful"-a word which the audience might have echoed with a different application. The "Passion" choruses were not less successful; and the same must be said of "Lift up your heads." When the vast audience rose to receive the "Hallelujah," thus paying homage to a divine inspiration, the effect conjoined with that of the music was most moving; even the spectacle alone might well have excited emotion. How splendid a climax was put to the choral performance by "Worthy is the Lamb" and "Amen," it is easy to imagine. It crowned the day's proceedings with the laurel of success, and sent the audience away impressed with the conviction that they had assisted at a triumph of creative and executive art-as, indeed, they had. Though less effective than the choruses, the solos were given in a manner worthy of all praise by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, Signor Foli, and Mr. Santley. The popular soprano made her mark, as usual, in "Come unto Him" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth"—airs which well suit her fervid manner. Madame Patey was no less successful in "He shall feed His flock" and "He was despised," while Mr. Maas showed an advance upon previous efforts by a rendering of the Passion solos, which was as notable for pathos as his delivery of "Thou shalt dash them" was for power and energy. Signor Foli's airs were those of the first part, Mr. Santley taking those of the second. Each artist fully sustained his reputation; the baritone receiving an unusual "ovation" after "Why do the nations." Mr. Manns, nothing but good can be said. With firm, clear beat he perfectly controlled the vast mass of performers; his tempi were correct, and he extended to the chorus all the help in a Conductor's power.

It was expected that the Selection Day (24th ult.) would show a material falling off in attendance. Bad times scarcely affect "The Messiah" and "Israel"; but if there be weakness about anywhere it tells on the Selection, for reasons we need not stop to indicate. Gloomy predictions were, however, entirely falsified by the result. mustered more than 22,000 strong, and thus assured the How relieved by this success of the Festival as a whole. were the officials and, indeed, all interested in the result, it is very easy to imagine. The proceedings began once more with extreme punctuality, and, again also, not a hitch occurred to mar the satisfaction of performers or audience. This time the chief interest did not spring from the choruses, which, sooth to say, fell short of the usual attraction. They were only nine in number, and of these but one—"Love and Hymen" ("Hercules")—was an addition to the repertory. The names of the others sound very familiar in connection with Handel Festivals: "How very familiar in connection with Handel Festivals: "How excellent" ("Saul"), "Ye sons of Israel" ("Joshua"), "Blest be the man" ("Joseph"), "We never will bow down" ("Judas"), "We hear" ("Judas"), "See the conqu'ring hero" ("Judas"), "Haste thee, Nymph" ("L'Allegro"), "As from the power" ("Ode on St. Cecilia's Day"). This group might have been improved upon, especially as some of them are heard more often than is fair considering the neglect endured by many agently confair considering the neglect endured by many equally good examples of the master's genius. Their performance left hardly anything to desire; nevertheless it was felt that the centre of attraction had shifted from the chorus to the orchestra and soloists, who had more important work in hand. The purely instrumental pieces were four, beginning with an old acquaintance in the shape of the overture to "Saul." This was played with great breadth of style and precision, the violins especially distinguishing themselves in the respects just named. But a greater success attended the performance of the Concerto for double orchestra, which held rank as principal novelty in the Festival scheme. We are told that this work was discovered among the composer's autograph scores at Buckingham Palace by Mr. W. S. Rockstro, when engaged in making researches for a Handel biography. It is said, moreover, that no record of its performance exists, but that it was played in public during the master's life-time may be assumed. So important a thing was not likely to remain on the shelf throughout the years when Handel was labouring like a giant to produce novelties. Its date is supposed to be about 1740, the period of his greatest need; Italian opera having failed him, and oratorio not yet come to his rescue. The concerto is written for two wind bands, consisting of oboes, flutes and bassoons, with supplementary strings, &c. It contains five movements, of which decidedly the most noteworthy are the fourth and last. These are an Allegro, chiefly founded upon an energetic ground bass for unison strings, and a Tempo ordinario noticeable for the ingenuity of its counterpoint and the manner in which the two sets of oboes are employed to answer each other, or move in thirds throughout long "runs." Both movements are uncommonly fine, and exhibit the composer at his best as a writer for the orchestra. But the whole work may be described as in-teresting and valuable. It was played remarkably well and evoked loud applause, much of which might have been intended for the oboes, by whom the "runs" were given with great clearness and quaintness of effect. The Concerto in B flat for organ and orchestra came next, Mr. Best presiding at the solo instrument. A composition so well known on paper need not be discussed here. It is said not to have been heard with orchestral accompaniment since Handel's death, and the fact may be as stated. The more credit belongs to the Festival managers for reviving it in a complete form after so extended a sleep. Mr. Best showed his usual skill in executing the solo part, and received a special round of applause as he retired from the organ seat. The last orchestral number was the favourite Violin Sonata in A, played by 200 violins, with an accompaniment as arranged by Ferdinand David. We have nothing to say on behalf of this treatment of a work intended for a single instrument. Indeed, we repudiate it altogether as not only inartistic, but mischievous in tendency. Where is this sort of thing to stop if it be sanctioned in any particular case? It must be said, however, that Mr. Manns was justified in laying upon his violins so delicate a task. The 200 played almost like one, their unity being as remarkable as the fulness and beauty of the tone produced. Evidently the audience, who made no question of the procedure, were much impressed by the effect. Their applause was loud and long sustained. Turning to the airs, we have first to speak of "Angels ever bright and fair" and "Sweet bird," as sung by Madame Albani. The first-named is familiar on her lips, but not the second, which she took for the first time, using a cadenza for voice and flute, written years ago for Jenny Lind, who made the song from "Il Pensieroso" one of her favourite selections. Madame Albani created a great effect with this example of decorative art, and had a skilled supporter in Mr. Alfred Wells. "From mighty kings" and "But oh! what art can teach," were well sung by Madame Valleria, who also joined Madame Trebelli in the duet, "We never will bow down." "Ombra mai fù" (Xerxes) was entrusted to the safe hands of the contralto just named, and thus appealed in its original form to a public many of whom were familiar with Hellmesberger's transcription. "Waft her, angels" and "Love in her eyes" were as acceptable as ever from the hands of Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas doing justice to "Sound an alarm" and a very beautiful air. "Tell fair Irene," from the opera of "Atalanta." "His sceptre is the rod of righteousness" and "Nasce al bosco" had every advantage from Mr. Santley's fine singing, as had the solo in "Haste thee, nymph," from Mr. Barring-ton Foote's appropriate delivery. With all this excellence of subject and manner, the success of the Selection was not for a moment in doubt.

On Friday (26th ult.) the Festival ended with a fine performance of the colossal "Israel in Egypt"—a work never heard elsewhere to such advantage. With this the climax of sublimity was reached. To the audience it really seemed as though nothing could possibly transcend the effect in grandeur and majesty, or so deeply move the feelings. Eloquent words have been said about "Israel" at the Crystal Palace, but attempts at description are as hopeless as in the case of Niagara. The impression made is incommunicable through the medium of language; but at least we can express gratitude for the gift of such a phenomenal work, and for the skill which makes possible its presentation under unique conditions. In "Israel," more, perhaps, than in any other oratorio, lies the immortality of Handel. Such a demonstration of genius cannot be challenged, but must remain a power while ability to recognise greatness belongs to the human race.

Concerning the performance of "Israel" there could hardly have been misgiving. The first thought of presenting the work under Handel Festival conditions was certainly bold, even to rashness, but now success is almost as sure as in the case of "The Messiah." This speaks volumes for the skill of our amateur choristers, who might fling down their rendering of the double choruses, as a gage of battle, to the entire musical world. There was scarcely a weak point of any importance on Friday; but, as usual, the most risky effort was made in "And with the blast of thy nostrils"; the tenors, in one place, very nearly coming to grief. How impressively the greatest of the choral numbers were given can be imagined. The "Hailstone" fairly took the audience by imagned. The "Haistone fairly took the audience by storm, and had to be repeated in compliance with an enthusiastic demand. "He sent a thick darkness," "But as for His people," "But the waters overwhelmed," "Sing ye to the Lord," and "The people shall hear!"—all these, to speak of no others in the mighty chain, were magnificent, the execution being worthy of the composer's music, to which it lent a moving power that Handel himself could scarcely have conceived. Thus, happily, did the Festival resources bear the strain upon their completeness, and win another triumph for an enterprise whose good fortune has been unbroken. The few solo numbers were in the hands of Madame Valleria, Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Patey, and Mr. Lloyd; Messrs. Bridson and King taking "The Lord is a man of war." These and King taking "The Lord is a man of war." These artists did justice to their task, but we need mention only Mr. Lloyd's rendering of "The enemy said," which met with extraordinary success. The favourite tenor never sung with more power; indeed, he roused absolute enthusiasm; the storm of applause continuing till he consented to repeat the air. At the close of the performance "God save the Queen" was sung to Sir M. Costa's arrangement, and then orchestra and audience joined in giving proof of admiration for Mr. Manns, whose labours during the week had been brilliantly successful. When the conductor answered a loud "call" he was applauded on all sides, but not a whit more than he deserved. The demonstration had been fairly earned by arduous labour, and exceptional ability in controlling masses of performers. That principals, orchestra, and chorus bravely supported him need not be said. Enough that all worked well together, and made the result memorable for its completeness. We may add here that the additional the late Sir M. Costa, which have now been printed for general convenience. There remains to state that the attendance at the Rehearsal was 17,829; at "The Messiah," 22,721; and on the Selection Day, 22,161. At the time of writing, just before going to press, the figures for "Israel" had not reached us, but it was expected that they would almost, if not quite, equal those of the corresponding day in 1883.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

A BRIEF season of Italian Opera, arranged by Mr. Mapleson, was announced to commence at Covent Garden Theatre on the 16th ult.; but, unfortunately, Madame Adelina Patti was too ill to sing, and as the whole undertaking rested solely upon her exertions, the opening was postponed until the following Saturday, when she appeared as the heroine in "La Traviata," singing perhaps even more finely than we have heard her for years. fors è lui" was simply one of the most perfect renderings of a show vocal piece that can possibly be imagined; and in her great duet with the elder Germont, and the whole of the final scene she elicited from a brilliant audience the most enthusiastic marks of approbation. Neither Signor Giannini's Alfredo nor Signor De Anna's Germont produced any remarkable effect, although the latter has a good, robust baritone voice; but Madame Patti atoned for all the defects of the opera-even the unsympathetic singing of the conventional Italian Opera chorus—and the result was a triumphant success. On the 23rd ult., "Semiramide," with Madame Patti as the Assyrian Queen and Madame Scalchi as Arsace, was given, the charm of Rossini's music, despite its ill-assorted union with the libretto it is presumed to illustrate, again asserting its power over all hearers. The thankless part of Assur was fairly well sung by Signor Del Puente. Signor Rinaldini was Idreno, and Signor Cherubini Oroe. Signor Arditi has proved, as usual, an excellent Conductor. There have been rumours of Madame Patti's appearance as Carmen, but up to the time of our going to press the opera has not been announced.

GAIETY THEATRE.

Those who closely observe the outward phenomena or musical life in our metropolis cannot fail to note the curious ebb and flow of particular schools and forms of art from

Three years ago German opera, or, more time to time. properly speaking, Wagnerian opera, occupied a foremost place in public attention, whereas at the present time it is the lyric drama of France that is mostly in the ascendant. Some profess to see in this a general re-action in favour of light tuneful works as opposed to those which call for a severe exercise of the intellectual faculties. All such notions, however, may be dismissed as absolutely preposterous. It is merely owing to a series of fortuitous circumstances that French opera has gained a temporary prominence, and if any one believed that Wagner's music was declining in favour the experience of the recent series of Richter Concerts must have satisfactorily dispelled the idea. It is entirely to the public advantage that the graceful and purely legitimate form of art known as opera comique should have a hearing, and for that reason we are glad to welcome the production of such works as the "Manon" of M. Massenet, and the "Lakmé" of M. Léo "Délibes. If neither of these is such a masterpiece in its way as, for example, Bizet's "Carmen," both are worthy examples of a school which attained its brightest exempli-Though the name of fication in the works of Auber. Délibes has only become familiar in this country during the last few years, and merely on account of his charming ballet music, he is by no means a young musician, and it does not seem likely that his talent will undergo any further development. According to Pougin's Supplement to Fétis (there is no mention of him in Grove's "Dictionary") his first stage work, an operetta called "Deux sous de Charbon," was produced in 1855, when he was nineteen years of age, and during the next eleven years he wrote many similar trifles, which were more or less successful. But his first real triumph was in the ballet "La cessful. But his first real triumph was in the base Da Source," of which he composed the greater part, and which was produced at the Grand Opera in 1866. This was followed by "Coppelia" and "Sylvie," the music of which quickly gained widespread popularity apart from the stage. His first efforts at the Opera Comique, "Le Roi l'a dit," and "Jean de Nivelle," made no particular impression, but "Lakmé," produced on April 14, 1883, was once hailed as a chef d'œuvre, and the verdict of Paris has been ratified elsewhere. Part of its success was doubtless due to the clever and charming impersonation of the leading rôle by Mdlle. Van Zandt, and it remains to be seen whether it will retain its vitality apart from the gifted young American artist. Certainly the favour accorded to the opera is not in any sense due to the libretto. MM. Gondinet and Gille cannot possess much sense of humour, or they would not have woven such a tissue of nonsense, in which the usual Gallic ignorance of English character and manners is but one of several features which do violence to our notions of probability and common sense. The plot of "Lakmé" has been so well discussed in the ordinary journals that we do not propose to reproduce it But it may be noted that an improvement in the flow of the work has been effected by the removal of the prim English governess, Miss Bentson and her two charges, though if the change was made out of regard to our fancied susceptibilities it need not have been under-The average Briton is egotistic enough on certain points, but foreign caricature only excites his risible faculties; it does not wound him as it does the sensitive

In speaking of the music of "Manon" last month, we remarked that " it cannot be said that the colouring of the lighter portions of the work is ever striking, or that more is attempted than a melodious and appropriate setting of the words; but the music is always agreeable, and passes along so pleasantly that we care not too critically to dissect it." These words will apply with equal fitness to "Lakmé." Indeed the treatment in the latter work is even more light and delicate, nothing approaching to grandeur of ensemble being attempted from first to last. In his endeavour to impart what is known as local colour M. Délibes has been highly successful. Whenever the Indian maiden or her friends are on the stage the melodies and orchestration are tinged with Oriental feeling, though only once does the composer introduce a genuine Hindoo This occurs in the second act, when Lakmé, at her father's command, endeavours to attract her English lover by the sound of her voice. Among the most pleasing which he conveys impressions of country life. It alone, morceaux in the opera may be named a little duet for the heroine and her attendant Mallika, "Sous les dômes Apaie", the first duet of the lovers, "C'est le dieu de la Jeunesse"; an expressive air for Nilakantha, Lakme's father; in the second act, the heroine's fascination aria, with carillon accompaniment-a very clever piece of vocal display; and a love song for the tenor at the beginning of the third act. In brief, "Lakmé" is an opera that one can listen to with satisfaction, though there is nothing in it to stir the higher intellectual or emotional faculties.

The reports concerning the talent of Mdlle. Van Zandt have scarcely been exaggerated. Since she last appeared in London, a mere child, she has developed into a soprano of more than ordinary technical attainments. Her voice is not powerful and her method is not free from reproach; but she is a complete mistress of her scales, and her acting is marked by extreme charm of manner and considerable command of expression. The company engaged by M. Mayer to support her is generally efficient, M. Dupuy (tenor) and M. Carroul (baritone) demanding especial mention. The orchestra, selected almost wholly from the late Italian Opera band, is admirable, and Signor Bevignani is a capable Conductor.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

THE announcement that Mr. Henry Leslie would resume the direction of his choir must have given satisfaction to a large number of music lovers, and we hope that the mischief wrought by his retirement has not gone too far to be repaired. It is easy to understand that Mr. Leslie saw with profound regret that the class of music to which he had devoted his energies for twenty-five years was likely to suffer greatly owing to his withdrawal from the field. The cause in which he laboured was, as he justly observes in his address to his choir, truly national in its character, and it would be a thousand pities were the rapidly growing popularity of instrumental Concerts to result in a diminution of favour towards the madrigal and the part-song. In concluding his address the conductor uses these significant words: " If Mr. Leslie's desire meets with support from the public, well and good. But if his re-entrance into the active musical work of London is proved to be not required, he will accept the verdict whatever it may be." aspect of St. James's Hall, at the Concert on the 4th ult., was certainly not encouraging, but hasty conclusions should not be drawn from this. June is not a favourable time to commence a new musical undertaking, and if Mr. Leslie will make a fresh trial next winter we do not doubt but that public interest in his enterprise will quickly revive. It was pleasant to see that the members of the choir had rallied round their old chief, and it is only just to say that every item in the programme was rendered with that rare finish of style and perfect refinement which made the Leslie Choir so famous in past years. At the same time we would point out the necessity of infusing fresh blood into the ranks, particularly in the female department. This surely would be a task of no great difficulty at the present The scheme of the 4th ult. was of the usual pattern, and included two new items by the Conductor-namely, a Shakespearian Madrigal, "O let me play the fool," and a Serenade "Golden slumbers." Both of these are cleverly written, but for musical effect we prefer the second, a charming little piece piquantly harmonised. Other items in which the excellence of the choir was prominently displayed, were Weekkes's Madrigal "As Vesta was," Pearsall's "Lay a garland," and Wesley's Motett "In exitu Israel." The second and last Concert was announced for the 27th ult.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

AT the sixth Concert, important works by Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt were presented; the greatest of the "Pastoral" Symphony. These gave general satisfaction, were admirably played, and much applauded. No composition of Beethoven's receives more justice at the hands of Richter's orchastes than the heautiful gameloany though of Richter's orchestra than the beautiful symphony through as thus given, would make a Concert, so much enjoyment is compressed into the space occupied by its performance. The Wagner piece was Siegmund and Sieglinde's love duet from "Die Walküre," beautifully sung by Madame Valleria and Mr. Lloyd, who were rewarded with hearty applause. The Liszt selections need not long detain us. These were two in number, both from his Oratorio "Christus." The first—a pastoral entitled "Singing of the Shepherds at the Manger," founded, like Handel's "Messiah" movement, upon a Pifferari melody—illustrates the dexterity and effect with which Liszt can use the orchestra when he has not to call upon his own powers for ideas. The movement is quite pretty, and charmingly scored. The second piece, "March of the three Holy Kings," is pretentious but weak, and even commonplace, though the composer tries hard to lift it out of the ruck of things open to such epithets. Both movements were well played. The audience, however, showed little regard for them. It is curious to see how stubbornly indifferent those who here acclaim

Wagner remain to his friend and father-in-law. Two novelties were presented at the seventh Concert (the 8th ult.), in company with Mozart's Symphony in E fitte deliciously played) and the Overture and Venusberg music from "Tannhauser." The first took the form of an Overture to Hölderlin's "Hyperion," by Eugene d'Albert, the young musician who distinguished himself sometime since in so unhappy a manner. In estimating his music we must forget Mr. d'Albert's contemptuous references to the land of his birth and training. It is, nevertheless, permitted to marvel greatly that the young composer should have allowed his music to be played before an audience representing a country so utterly lost to art as England. There is a greater wonder still; namely, that Mr. d'Albert should have taken the trouble to write so hopeless a work as this Overture. Its inordinate length; its utter disregard of artistic canons; its excruciating harmonies, and want of cohesion and intelligibleness are, combined, a truly astonishing whole. Yet there is plenty of ability manifested in it—ability which, like the splendour of Milton's Satan, makes its inevitable destiny the more ignominious. Mr. d'Albert's Overture is not without a use. Its serves to show young composers towards what a gulf certain modern teachers are leading them, and it exemplifies to the public the "bitter end" of principles which many are thoughtlessly tolerating. We are glad to say that Mr. d'Albert's Overture met with the fate it deserved. Faint applause and unmistakable sibillation combined to extinguish it beyond hope of revival in this country. The second novelty was the Symphonie "Funèbre et Triom-" composed by Berlioz for the burial of the victims of phale," composed by Berlioz for the burner of the July. Written under special conditions for an orchestra designed to perform in the open air, this work must submit to material modification when its execution in a room is contemplated. But, in a modified form, it loses the characteristics that chiefly make it interesting, and enjoys no particular raison d'être. Played and heard as a pièce de circonstance it made but little serious pretension. There are, however, some most melodious phrases in it, while the orchestration, even as modified, is superb, and the movement with trombone solo absolutely impressive. The Symphony was received without enthusiasm.

At the eighth Concert (the 15th ult.), but one novelty was presented—to wit, R. Fuchs' Symphony in C (Op. 37). This work is an example of a class of music which Wagner connected with Kapellmeisters, and treated with lofty scorn. Classical in design; well written for the orchestra, easily understood, and pleasant to hear, Fuchs' Symphony possesses everything save the distinction which ideas can give. The composer is a good musician; but, like so many of his class, he has nothing to say beyond the ordinary commonplaces of musical talk. A man so situated should keep quiet. Whenever he opens his mouth he only adds to the vain gabble of a loquacious world. Herr Richter has been charged with preferring his countryman over the heads of several English composers, who could write just as well. The accusation is scarcely just, because the place filled by Fuchs was kept open for a native musician as long as hope remained of one coming forward to take it. The programme of this Concert was completed by the "Leonora" Overture, Glinka's "Komarinskaja," and two vocal selections from Wagner, sung by Herr Henschel.

The season—which, we regret to hear, has not been financially successful—ended with the ninth Concert (the 22nd ult.), at which were performed Stanford's "Elegiac Ode," written for the last Norwich Festival, and Beethoven's Choral Symphony; Mr. Lloyd singing the Trial Songs from "Die Meistersinger." There is no need to dwell upon subjects which have been so frequently discussed. Enough that the performance was worthy of them, and that the series of Concerts ended in a manner which must have satisfied those most concerned for its character. A short autumn series is already announced.

SEÑOR SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

At the fourth of these remarkably successful entertainments, on May 30, the popular violinist performed the solo part in Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, a work that suits him to a nicety, as indeed it should, having been written expressly for him. Why the composer bestowed the title of Symphony rather than Concerto upon it is difficult to say, as the treatment of the orchestra, though important, is not more so than is usually the case in modern Concertos. But, its title apart, the work is full of clever effects, the Spanish character being well maintained. At this Concert Señor Sarasate also introduced a Ballad, by Henschel, and a Rhapsodie Hongroise, by Leopold Auer, the last being a showy piece in the form invented by Liszt, that is, a slow movement, or "Lassan," leading to a quick one, or "Frischka." Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, Rubinstein's ballet airs from "Feramors," and the Overture to "Le Domino Noir," were also included in the programme. The public interest in these Con-certs being far from exhausted, an extra performance was given on Saturday, the 13th ult., which was as well attended as its predecessors. On this occasion the Spanish virtuoso brought forward two works by Saint-Saëns; namely, a Concertstück and an Introduction and Rondo. Neither of these pieces has any special character, but both are effectively written for the solo instrument. Raff's Suite was also performed, the rendering of the final moto perpetuo in this work being one of Señor Sarasate's most brilliant pieces of display. The orchestral works were Beethoven's C minor Symphony, two movements from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and the Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor." We understand that the number of Concerts will be increased to six next season,

MADAME FRICKENHAUS AND HERR LUDWIG'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE third of this highly interesting series of Chamber Concerts took place at Princes' Hall, on the 11th ult., when the programme included Dvorák's Pianoforte Trio in B flat major, Op. 21 (Madame Frickenhaus, Herr Ludwig, and Mr. Albert); Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," for pianoforte (Madame Frickenhaus); Schubert's "Rondo Brillant," for pianoforte and violin (Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Ludwig); violin solos by Spohr and Bach (Herr Ludwig); and Haydn's String Quartet, Op. 46, No. 3 (Herr Ludwig, Messrs. Collins, Gibson, and Albert). Miss Ambler was the vocalist. With the fourth Concert (25th ult.), the present short season has come to a most successful close. Both the Concert-givers appeared to be in their "best form"; Madame Frickenhaus distinguishing herself with a very spirited reading of a selection from Schumann's "Kreisleriana," and Herr Ludwig adding to his previously scored successes by a masterly performance of the well-worn Nocturne in E major, by Ernst; a performance which leads us to expect a higher flight of this artist's ambition in the répertoire of his instrument on future occasions. Herr Ludwig was associated with the lady pianist in a con amore performance of Schumann's "Fantasiestücke," the Concert having opened with Brahms's Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Madame Frickenhaus, Messrs. Ludwig, Collins, Gibson, and Albert) and concluding with Mozart's String Quartet in B major (Op. 15), in which the above-named gentlemen took part. Miss Hope Glenn contributed vocal solos—viz., a seldom heard air, "Pupille sdegnose," from the opera "Musco Scavola" (Handel) and two songs by Dr. Arne; Miss Bessie Waugh being a rather nervous accompanist. These Concerts have met with an increasing patronage during their short progress, and fully deserve, from their intrinsic excellence, to be added to our regular institutions during the season.

HERR FRANZ RUMMEL'S RECITAL.

Among the comparatively few Pianoforte Recitals given this season that of Herr Rummel, at St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult., will rank as one of the most interesting. not an executant of phenomenal ability, Herr Rummel must be regarded as a master of his instrument and an artist who interprets works of the highest calibre with a full intellectual perception of their meaning. In other words, he does not merely play the notes, but gives a definite reading of the music without extravagance or any obtrusive assertion of his own personality at the expense of the composers. Occasionally his artistic earnestness gets the better of his manipulative powers, but this is the only defect noticeable in his performances. The programme provided was an excellent one, the most important items being Schumann's magnificent Fantasia in C, Op. 17, Mendelssohn's masterly Variations Sèrieuses, Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor, and Handel's Suite in E with "The Harmonious Blacksmith "variations. The Schumann and Mendelssohn works were very finely interpreted, the latter especially being as admirable a piece of execution as the most fastidious could desire.

MDLLE, KLEEBERG'S SECOND RECITAL.

JAMES'S HALL was well attended on Saturday, the 6th ult., when Mdlle. Kleeberg gave her last Pianoforte Recital for the present season. Her programme contained but one important work, namely Weber's Sonata in A flat, which in common with its companions is not now heard so often as its merits deserve. Its performance was therefore welcome, although the pianist's reading was open to question. It is necessary to protest against the growing tendency to distort the works of classical masters, except the very highest. Beethoven is safe from such treatment, for any adornment (!) of his music would be deemed a sacrilege, but poor Weber is made to suffer terribly at the hands of editors and executants. Mdlle, Kleeberg made no important alterations in the text of the A flat sonata, but she indulged in tricks of style, especially unauthorised changes of tempo, for which no excuse could be pleaded. Most of the smaller pieces by Bach, Haydn, Handel Bennett, Bizet, Mendelssohn, Chopin, and other composers were charmingly rendered. Mdlle. Kleeberg's abilities are so great that there is not the slightest occasion for her to seek for effect by illegitimate means.

FAWCETT MEMORIAL CONCERT.

A HIGHLY interesting performance was given in the Connaught Hall of the new Albert Palace, Battersea Park, on the 20th ult., in aid of the funds of the Fawcett Memorial Committee. It will be remembered that the late Postmaster General was afflicted with blindness, hence there was something particularly and specially appropriate in the fact of the Memorial Concert being held under the auspices of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, S.E., where the labours of Mr. F. J. Campbell, L.D., and his painstaking staff, have been so successful of recent years in ameliorating the condition of, and opening up new fields of outward light appear to possess a compensating sense, for which our terminology supplies no exact equivalent; perhaps it may be best expressed as the sense of locality. In principle, the fulfilled oarsman, an excellent pedestrian, and an ardent angler, who could pop a fly just over the nose of a wary trout as the pupils of the Normal College; they play the pianoforte with as much brilliancy, and certainly with as much precision as those who are able to see where their fingers are going. It is a triumph of preceptive art, and it only shows how the natural aptitude of the blind can be developed under competent training. The Concert was to have been conducted by Herr Klindworth, who, it is understood, had accepted the invitation to visit London expressly for that purpose; but, almost at the eleventh hour, it transpired that the Teutonic Professor had thought better of the matter, and had retracted his promise. Fortunately, help was at hand, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, consenting to officiate as Herr Klindworth's substitute, threw himself into the breach with courage and determination, and, by sheer force of talent, contrived to bring the Concert, though with insufficient rehearsals, to a successful issue. Perhaps, after all, it was as well that things fell out as they did; we have had over much of German musical importations of late, and the emergency on the present occasion proves that we have no necessity to send out of the country for a thoroughly efficient Conductor. The programme included the first movement of M. Guilmant's Symphony for organ and orchestra, No. 1, in D minor; Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor; and Liszt's First Pianoforte Concerto in E flat-all entrusted, as far as the solo instrument was concerned, to Mr. Alfred Hollins, who recently had the honour of performing the same selection before H.I.H. the Crown Princess, in Berlin; Sterndale Bennett's delightfully fresh and graceful Capriccio, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 22—charmingly rendered by Miss Jeannie Gilbert; Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody, No. 2 ("Burns"); and vocal works, solo and concerted, sung by Misses Campbell, Gilbert, Carson, and Hyde, Messrs. Atkinson, Fairchild, Moncur, Pryde, West, and a select choir. Of these the most notable were Mendelssohn's Psalm xliii., "Judge me, O God"; and the same master's Psalm ii. for double quartet and double choir-given with faultless precision, and singular delicacy of nuance; and, moreover, with a fervency of expression which these works too frequently lack. Gibbons' madrigal, "The Silver Swan," and Mr. A. J. Caldicott's humorous glee, "The House that Jack Built," also displayed the good qualities of the choir to advantage. There is something very pathetic, if not absolutely painful, in witnessing these sightless singers lift up their voices for the behoof of an audience which they cannot see, in a world they know nothing of; but closing one's sensibilities to this fact, the real musical result is very admirable. Mr. Hollins, though very young, is already a most accomplished organist and pianist, there apparently being no such a thing as 'difficulty" for him in connection with the keyboard. Mr. Mackenzie, both on making his first appearance in the orchestra, and at the conclusion, was applauded with a heartiness which left no doubt of the sincerity of the visitors' approval of his endeavours.

BALFE MEMORIAL CONCERT.

THE particular appropriateness of the present season for a "Balfe Memorial Concert" is not apparent, but the entertainment of Wednesday, the 10th ult., at the Royal Albert Hall, gave obvious satisfaction to many thousands of people, and thus no doubt answered the object of its promoters. It consisted of lengthy selections from the popular composer's operas, "The Talisman" and "The Bohemian Girl," and a dozen miscellaneous items. We shall not be expected to criticise such a programme as this. Enough that it served to present Balfe's genius in the most favourable light, the performers being almost exclusively artists of the highest eminence. Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, who was in remarkably fine voice, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Crotty, among others, appeared, and there was a full orchestra and chorus under Mr. Cusins. We may regret that Balfe did not more worthily employ his musical gifts, but on the utilitarian principle of the greatest good of the greatest number, he fulfilled his mission right well, for his name is still a power with many to whom that of Mozart or Schubert is a MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

THE thirty-seventh Meeting of this Society, which took place at Willis's Rooms, on the 6th ult., and concluded its work for the present season, was of more than ordinary interest. We may pass over the miscellaneous portion of the programme with a word of approval for a song, "It is not because I love you," by F. S. Southgate, and some Irish Dances for pianoforte duet by Algernon Ashton. That which made the occasion important was the first performance of a Cantata for male voices, entitled "The Red King," by the late Mrs. Meadows White, who was a member of the Society. The work is a setting of Kingsley's spirited poem descriptive of the death of William Rufus. We are inclined to rank this among the best of Mrs. Meadows White's compositions. The music is characterised throughout by boldness of manner and a rude swing admirably in keeping with the subject. It does not flag for an instant, and the climax is really stirring in effect. Unfortunately the performance left very much to desire. We do not refer to the soloists, Mr. Harper Kearton and Mr. Ernest Birch, who were all that could be desired; but the choir were quite unequal to the dis-charge of its duties. We hope that so admirable a work will be heard again shortly under better auspices.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

A VERY successful Festival was held in aid of this Fund in Norwich, on Thursday, the 4th ult. The weather being very propitious, the attendance throughout the day was exceptionally good, large numbers of visitors coming into the town from the surrounding neighbourhood. The Festival opened with a service in the Cathedral, when the following anthems were sung: Croft's "Cry aloud and shout," Mendelssohn's "Why rage," Goss's "Almighty and merciful God," and Bach's "Blessing, glory," with Gibbons's Service in F. Owing to the alterations which are being carried on in the choir of the Cathedral, the service was held in the nave, and the whole of the music was given without accompaniment, the effect created by the large number of trained voices being remarkably fine. Mr. F. C. Atkinson, the Organist of the Cathedral, conducted. The sermon was preached by the Dean of Norwich.

In the afternoon an Organ Recital was given in St. Andrew's Hall by Mr. Walter Parratt, whose remarkable executive powers were employed to great advantage in a well selected programme, notably in Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major, which created a marked impression with the large audience.

St. Andrew's Hall was again well filled in the evening, when a Concert of glees, madrigals, &c., was given. A special feature in the Concerts given by this Society is the part-singing, and this was fully exemplified in the rendering of the "Young Musicians" (Kücken) by the Norwich choir, Cooke's "Strike the lyre" by the Ely choir, "Return, blest days," by the Windsor choir, and most notably in "The cloud-capped towers" by members of St. Paul's Cathedral choir, which stood apart as an unrivalled specimen of part-singing. The youthful choristers of the Chapel Royal and Westminster Abbey distinguished themselves in Roberti's three-part song "The nights," which was enthusiastically encored. Encores were also awarded to Madame Florence Winn in Parker's "Jerusalem" (with organ accompaniment by Dr. Bunnett), Miss Eleanor Farnol in Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," Mr. Gawthrop in "Alice, where art thou?" and Mr. Brockbank in "Hybrias, the Cretan"; while Mr. Kempton's rendering of Benedict's fine song "Rage, thou angry storm," and Mr. Hanson's "Where'er you walk" were received with unqualified approbation. Mr. Atkinson did admirable service as accompanist throughout the evening, and the part-songs were conducted by Mr. Winn. We must not omit to state that the Mayor, who took the warmest interest in the Festival, attended the service, with the Corporation, in state, and was also present at the Concert. We understand that the receipts for the day were about £210, and considerable praise is due to the Local Secretary, Mr. J. H. Brockbank, for the admirable manner in which the local arrangements were carried out.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE Cambridge University Musical Society gave its 185th Concert, before a crowded audience, at the Guildhall, on Thursday afternoon, the 11th ult. The programme -a special one, framed in memory of the bi-centenary of Bach and Handel—consisted entirely of works by those two great masters. The first part comprised Bach's Cantata "Ein feste Burg" (sung to the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck's English translation, "A stronghold sure"), and the Violin Concerto in A minor. The second contained Handel's Organ Concerto in A major and the "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day." A noticeable feature in the performance was the peculiar constitution of the orchestra, the arrangement of which was made to correspond as nearly as possible with that which prevailed in the first half of the eighteenth century. The only instruments employed were those indicated in the respective scores. The violin parts were reinforced by oboes in the proportion of two to three, and the part for the first trumpet was played upon an instrument of Handelian form, with contracted bore and exceedingly narrow mouthpiece, made (we were informed) expressly for this occasion. On this interesting instrument Mr. Morrow produced the B, C sharp, and D in alt with a silvery clearness quite unattainable on our modern trumpets, and with as little apparent effort as that manifested by an ordinary flute-player. In Handel's "Ode" the effect of the higher notes, accentuated by a more than ordinarily artistic interpretation of the important drum part, was particularly happy, and convinced all present that the result obtained was precisely that contemplated by the composer. The solo parts in Bach's Cantata were conscientiously rendered by two promising young artists, Miss Jannings (of the Royal College of Music) and Mr. Shore. In Handel's "Ode" the trying soprano part, and the equally important tenor, were given with excellent effect by Miss Carlotta Elliot and Mr. W. Marshall. Mr. Gompertz gave an effective rendering of Bach's Violin Concerto; and in the Organ Concerto, and the organ accompaniments generally, Mr. Parratt proved that the art of effectively accompanying a Handelian figured-bass is neither lost nor in abeyance.

We may accept this Concert as a conclusive proof, not

We may accept this Concert as a conclusive proof, not only that it is possible to produce the works of Handel and Bach in accordance with the indications furnished by the composers themselves, but that, when so produced, these works are infinitely more effective than when their manifest intention is obscured by the introduction of modern instruments and modern orchestration. The result of the performance, under Mr. Stanford's able direction, was most satisfactory; and we trust that we may ere long witness a repetition of the experiment on a still larger scale.

THE plans of musical societies for the ensuing season are, of course, as yet very much in embryo, and it would be impossible to speak with any definitiveness as to what the programmes are likely to turn out. The financial results, however, of our two leading societies for the season 1884-5, as recently published, give some indication as to their future, which may be interesting in the interim.

Notwithstanding the general depression in trade and the consequent effect upon the income of the Philharmonic Society, the Directors were enabled, by a material reduction in the expenditure—partially secured at the cost of depreciating the artistic value of the Concerts—to show a balance on the right side of the account of about £200. It is therefore very probable that the performances of next season will be continued upon the same lines as last year, and that, with the valuable assistance of Mr. Halle's orchestra, the foremost place will be given to orchestral works.

The report of the Philharmonic Choral Society evidences in a practical manner the effect of hard times. Earnest and enthusiastic as the members of such a Society may be, it is essential that they should be supported by a willing and reliable public, and whilst, therefore, the loss upon the past season has been generously met by the contributions of the guarantors, the committee feel that the existence of the Society depends upon definite indications of promised assistance and support both from within and without. It is therefore intended to raise a new guarantee fund for at least £500, in order that a good financial basis may be ensured; and with an extended subscription list, there is little doubt that the Society will continue on the same basis as hitherto, confining its operations to the performance of great choral works on a fitting scale.

We understand there is a probability of one or more visits from Herr Richter and his famous band during the coming season, and that there is even a likelihood of his arranging for a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which would doubtless be greatly appreciated.

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

No Concerts of much importance have taken place in Bristol during the past few weeks. The chief event, perhaps, was the sixth annual Festival of the Bristol Church Choral Union, which was held at the cathedral on the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. Fear Dyer, the Organist of St. Nicholas. There was a crowded congregation and about 550 voices took part in the service. As the procession of choirs entered the west door, and took their places in the choir, Mr. George Riseley played the Andante from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony with much artistic The chanting of the Psalms was extremely good, feeling. and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, which were sung to Ernest Winchester's Services in B flat and D flat, were very The first anthem was by Sir John Goss: "The glory of the Lord"; it was most carefully sung, and evinced praiseworthy efforts on the part of the choirs during the time of preparation. The only weak feature of the service was the last anthem, "Hosanna to the Son of David" (Gibbons), which proved rather too trying a composition for a number of parish choirs. Mr. Riseley played Men-delssohn's Fifth Organ Sonata as a concluding voluntary. On the whole, we think the Festival was the most successful yet given in this city, and we are sure of the beneficial results of the meeting, for they are amply shown in the improvement of the music in those churches whose choirs belong to the Church Choral Association.

The series of Organ Recitals given at the Colston Hall, Bristol, during the winter season, by Mr. G. Riseley, were brought to a close on the 6th ult., when the distinguished Organist rendered a most delightful selection of music with his usual marked ability and power of expression. The performance was thoroughly appreciated by a large audience.

At Exeter, the Madrigal Society gave a very interesting Concert on May 21. The programme included two items by Exeter composers-a charming part-song by Mr. W. Bayly, late Conductor of the Society, which was very well Bayly, late Conductor of the Society, which was very well sung, and encored, and an excellent madrigal, well worthy of publication, "Arise, my fair," by Alfred Angel, Organist of Exeter Cathedral, 1842-76. Other noteworthy works were "The water-lily," Gade; "The victors' return," Mendelssohn; "Song of the silent land," Gaul; "Lo! the bee on fairy wing," Balfe; and Gibbons' eight-part madrigal, "O that the learned poets," several of which were encored. The singing showed considerable improvement in practices and effects that the in precision, and attention to light and shade, but the tenors were somewhat weak in proportion to the other parts.

The last of the Victoria Hall Organ Recitals was given by Mr. D. J. Wood, on the 13th ult., and included among other things a spirited and effective Postlude in D minor, other things a spirited and effective Postlude in D minor, by Mr. Ferris Tozer (a local composer), played for the first time, and encored. On the 16th ult. Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist" was performed at the Victoria Hall by the Oratorio Society. Miss Amy Sherwin created a very good impression in the part of Salome, and gave the bravura song "I rejoice in my youth," in excellent style, being enthusiastically encored. Madame Enriquez sang superbly as the Narrator and Mr. Redferr Hulling cause superbly as the Narrator, and Mr. Redfern Hollins gave a painstaking and judicious rendering of the music allotted to Herod Antipas, while Mr. Ludwig, as St. John the Baptist, sang with much dramatic force and impressiveness. The remarkably good till the close, the members evidently find-quartet "Blessed are they," however, was not satisfactory. and exhibited an evident want of rehearsal. The choruses (save for one unfortunate slip of the sopranos in the commencement of the Allegro in the Finale), were admirably sung throughout, reflecting the highest credit on the honorary conductor, Mr. G. W. Lyon. Especial mention must be made of the grand chorus "My soul, praise the Lord," on Dr. Croft's tune "Hanover," which could scarcely have been better sung. Mr. E. M. Vinnicombe played the organ very judiciously, and the strings, led by Mr. C. E. Bell, were highly efficient. The wind, however (particularly the brass) is not good, and there is much room for improvement in this department.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

On the 2nd ult. a Concert was given in the Queen Street Hall by Mr. Waddel's violin pupils, chiefly ladies, assisted by professional instrumentalists. The orchestral selection included easy symphonies by Haydn and Romberg, and an entr'acte from "Rosamunde," These, although not perfectly performed, evidenced satisfactory precision and a refinement that augurs well. Miss Macgregor contributed a violin solo (Mayseder's "Variations Brillantes"), and, in answer to a well-merited encore, played a Scottish melody. Miss Noble and Mr. Millar Craig displayed their vocal powers to advantage, Miss Noble especially excelling in Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhaüser.

On the following evening, Mr. Franklin Peterson gave a recital of sacred music in the Palmerston Place United Presbyterian Church, of which he is Organist. His rendering of Rheinberger's sonata advantageously showed the excellent style of his organ playing, and the two compositions of his own included in the programme promise well for his future as a composer. The choral portions were rendered by ladies of the choir, Mr. Peterson conducting.

On the afternoon of the 20th, the Edinburgh Diocesan Choral Association held its annual Festival in St. Mary's Cathedral. The choir, numbering about 300 voices, was admirable, under the conductorship of Mr. Collinson. The Anthems "I was glad" (Attwood), and "O clap your hands" (Stainer) were conspicuous numbers of the programme. Mr. William Harrison presided at the organ.

THE Annual Excursion of the Glasgow Choral Union took place on Saturday, the 13th ult. The trip this year was by steamer to Lochgoilhead, Lochgoil being one of the branches of the estuary of the Clyde, and famous as the scene of Campbell's "Lord Ullin's daughter." The "dark and stormy water" of the poem was, on this occasion, bright and calm, and the surrounding very romantic scenery of mountain and glen was seen at its best. There was a large muster of the Union. An hour or so was spent on shore, the opportunity being taken to photograph the party in a comprehensive group. Dancing was freely indulged in both going and returning, but there was very little choral music. A humorously written poetical itinerary or programme was distributed, the scope of which may be gathered from its title-" Handel's Down the Water music, a new suite by that esteemed master, discovered in a dream and composed in honour of the annual pic-nic of the Glasgow Choral Union." Creature comforts were liberally provided, and altogether the outing was of the most enjoyable character.

The practisings of the Union came to a close for the season on the 10th ult., when Mr. Myles, the president, made the gratifying announcement that at the performance in next season's Concerts of "The Rose of Sharon," the choruses in which have been in rehearsal by the Union for some little time, the composer, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, will himself act as Conductor. Madame Albani has been engaged for the performance, the other principals being Mr. Edward Lloyd, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The attendance at the Union practisings continued ing much enjoyment in singing "The Rose of Sharon" choruses—a good augury of a successful public performance next winter. The choral music of the Oratorio is very well prepared already. Mr. Mackenzie, I learn, is to conduct his oratorio, with the same orchestra, at Edinburgh and Aberdeen, on dates immediately following that of the Glasgow Concert.

Mr. E. J. Wareham, Organist of Claremont Street United Presbyterian Church, has been appointed accompanist to the Choral Union, in room of the late Mr. Channon

Cornwall.

We are to have a visit from Herr Richter and his orchestra in October, and two Concerts are to be given. At one of these, the programme, it is understood, will consist exclusively of selections from Wagner's works, while the other will embrace important examples of Beethoven. A local guarantee fund of £500 has been subscribed, largely, I should suppose, by resident countrymen of Herr Richter, as a precaution against possible failure.

With the exception of the Organ Recitals by Dr. Peace in the Cathedral, which were begun on the 22nd ult., scarcely any music of a high-class character will now be heard in Glasgow for two or three months. It is true that there are the bands in the several public parks during summer, but the music they discourse is, for the most part, light and ephemeral. I should not, however, forget the Musical Examinations, which usually take place during June, in the Glasgow public schools. I attended several of these examinations and found the juvenile choral singing, as a rule, very good.

MUSIC IN PAISLEY.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The Tannahill Choir Concert, on Gleniffer Braes, near Paisley, on the 6th ult., was attended, it is estimated, by no fewer than 25,000 persons, the original object of the Choir having been obtained—namely, to raise funds for the erection of a statue in Paisley to the poet Tannahill, the proceeds of these annual open-air Concerts are to be devoted to doing a like honour to Robert Burns, whose lyries Tannahill's are considered to approach very nearly. The greater of the two poets was chiefly drawn from on the present occasion, the melodies being arranged for mixed voices, and the choir numbered 500 voices. Mr. I.

Roy Fraser conducted.

A meeting was held in the Good Templar Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., for the purpose of distributing the prizes and certificates in connection with the "Scheme for the promotion of Musical Education in Paisley." There was a large attendance of both old and young, Mr. John A. Brown, one of the leading residents, and till lately the active honorary choral instructor of the local Choral Union, being in the chair. This was the close of the third course of work in connection with the Scheme, which a townsman, Mr. Barbour, has generously aided, giving a sum of money "to be expended in five years by a committee in the way thought best for the promotion of vocal music in Paisley," the outcome of which is the present scheme, started three years ago. It acts, to a large extent, as a stimulus to the systematic study of vocal music, and offers prizes to those who pass certain examinations, and, at the same time, offers a reward to the teacher who has trained his pupils to this point of efficiency. The various grades of examination are founded upon the certificates of the Tonic Sol-fa College, but are by no means confined to that notation. The committee, as we learn from the interesting report by Mr. J. Parlane, secretary, offered prizes for certificate examinations, scholarships, on the whole, very satisfactory. Mr. William Moodie and other gentlemen were the examiners. Prizes were likewise offered for original compositions and for harmonising a given melody; Mr. Ebenezer Prout acted as adjudicator in these. Mr. R. L. Reid took the prize for an original anthem, and Mr. W. L. Wiseman that for an original hymn tune, both compositions being of very fair promise. The example set by Paisley is surely one worthy of imitation by other towns. It is to be added that the prize compositions, and Macfarren's anthem "The Lord is my shepherd," were sung—the latter "at sight"—at the meeting by a choir conducted by Mr. Reid.

A GERMAN OPINION ON "THE ROSE OF SHARON."

In view of the favourable-and, indeed, enthusiasticreception accorded to Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Dramatic Oratorio" in this country, the following summary of a German review of the work, which, pending its ultimate performance in the Fatherland, is necessarily based merely upon a perusal of the score, will doubtless be welcomed by many of our readers. The article in question has appeared in recent numbers of Die Tonkunst, and emanates from the pen of a highly competent veteran musician, Herr Louis Schloesser. After a few introductory remarks, in the course of which a German translation of the words is earnestly recommended as a necessary preliminary to the general acceptance of the new work by the oratoriocultivating societies of his country, the reviewer goes on to say that, although not as yet so well and so favourably known in Germany as he is in his own country, the com-poser "has already achieved some victories here in connection with the performances of his Opera 'Colomba' at Hamburg, Darmstadt, and elsewhere. With an untiring capacity for hard work, an elasticity and freshness of invention, and a complete mastery over the resources, vocal and instrumental, of his art, Mackenzie combines a noblesse and solidity in his elaboration, an harmonic and melodious grace which, while raising the present production far above those of many of his contemporaries, also afford an earnest for superior excellence in the future." The writer The writer then offers a few cursory remarks respecting the historical development of oratorio, from its original, chiefly devotional or dogmatic character, to its expansion into the sphere of semf-biblical or legendary subjects, as exemplified in Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," and Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel." With a view to this and to the character and general musical treatment of the subject-matter of the "Rose of Sharon." the reviewer would have preferred its being described as "a Biblico-legendary Idyl"; an alternative suggestion to which the author of the libretto would probably have little objection to offer. Following up his able and thoughtful remarks by a rapid but sympathetic synopsis of the dramatic events embodied in the Oratorio, Herr Schloesser concludes as follows: "From the first to the very last note the experienced musical eye recognises the learned and practically-schooled master hand, in the treatment of the voices and the general symmetrical structure of the work, as well as in the sonorous effects of the former, the impressive declamatory passages, and the thoughtful and original orchestral combinations. A series of variously coloured tone pictures are interwoven in different situations of the Oratorio, arising from the 'leading-motive' embodied in the work, which obtains its first musical utterance in the duet of the lovers, 'My Beloved is mine.' Finally, I may mention, as especially happy instances of the composer's power of characterisation, having regard to the contrasts demanded by the respective situations, the joyous choruses of peasants, herdsmen, &c., the already mentioned duet for soprano and tenor, the picturesque ritornello, 'Spring morning on the Lebanon' (an excellent piece of orchestral painting), as well as the stately march, with chorus and solo, for the Sulamite; the visionary 'Dream Music,' the duet for soprano and baritone, and quartets with solo voices and chorus respectively. . . . Mackenzie's 'Rose of Sharon' would seem to indicate a further and a higher step of his creative activity, and we may accept it as furnishing conclusive evidence of the complete unification of poetry and music. At all events, his latest effort in this direction presents unmistakable claims for recognition which will not be disregarded on the part of our German musical institutions, whose taste, as is well known, is cosmopolitan, and who will only await the proper initiative to be given them in the present instance."

At the meeting of the Wagner Society, on Tuesday evening, the 27d ult., at 26, Leinster Gardens, Mr. H. F. Frost gave an interesting lecture on "Tristan und Isolde," musical illustrations of the opera being supplied by Mr. J. S. Shedlock at the pianoforte. At the next meeting, on the 17th inst., Miss Alma Murray will give a dramatic reading.

On Wednesday, the 10th ult., the London Sunday School Choir held its Thirteenth Anniversary Festival at the Crystal Palace, when a Concert was given on the Handel Orchestra by 4,000 Sunday School scholars from London and the provinces, assisted by 1,000 adult teachers and friends, and accompanied by the great organ and the Crystal Palace band. The programme, which opened with the hymn "O God our help in ages past," to the tune "St. Ann," comprised hymns, anthems, choruses, and part-songs, which were generally well rendered; Barnby's metrical chant, "The day is gently sinking," was given with surprising precision, taking into consideration the fact that the choir is mainly juvenile. A new anthem, composed for this festival by Mr. David Davies, the organist to the choir, is a composition of considerable merit, opening in the minor upon the words "Hear my crying, O God," developing into a bold and pleasing tripletime movement, upon the words "Praise the Lord, O my soul," and ending with a tuneful setting, in choral style, of the hymn" Praise my soul the King of Heaven"; Goss's Harvest Anthem "I will magnify Thee," was sung with much spirit, and the "Hallelujah" ("Messiah"), although suffering inevitably from the lack of power in the bass and tenor, was on the whole given with creditable precision. A three-part song by Kunkel, "The Skylark," received an encore; Smart's "Sea King," "The March of the Medes," by Shinn, and "All among the barley," were also exceedingly effective; and a little Catch, entitled "Call John," took the audience by surprise, and would have borne repeating. Altogether the Concert was most successful, the bright, fresh voices of the children being very charming. Mr. Hinton and his choir are to be congratulated upon the result of their thirteenth year's work. In the evening a Concert was given in the Concert Room, by the Gravesend Choir, assisted by the Bishopsgate Amateur Orchestral Society.

THE Catholic Church of St. Francis Xavier, Salisbury Street, Liverpool, was crowded on Sunday, May 31, special services being held in aid of the Choir Fund. At High Mass in the morning Gounod's Messe Solennelle ("de Pâques") was sung, and in the evening Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." The Mass is a recent production of the great French composer, having been rendered for the first time at Paris on Mid-Lent Sunday of the present year, under his personal direction; and the first hearing of it in Liverpool must have satisfied every one that it cannot fail to take rank amongst the very finest efforts of this great writer of church music. Especially is the Credo massive, and the same remark applies to the Sanctus, in which the song of the angels is imitated. The Kyrie and the Agnus Dei also are very fine. The harmonies in the Incarnatus are especially beautiful, and the unaccompanied vocal effects here and there in the Mass contribute to confirm the impression that Gounod has done nothing better, if as good; indeed it was unanimously pronounced to be the finest musical work ever produced at St. Francis Xavier's. As to the rendering of the Mass, the highest praise must be awarded to both choir and orchestra, which were well balanced and had evidently undergone careful training. Precision and an admirable regard to light and shade bore abundant testimony to the care and ability of the Conductor, Mr. John Goss, the director of music at St. Francis'. Gounod's "Ave Maria," artistically sung by Madame Laura Haworth, with violin and harp obbligato, admirably played by Mr. Ress, jun., and Mr. Jarvis, and the Coronation March from the "Prophète," finely performed by the orchestra at the close, were prominent items at both services. The effective and judicious handling of the organ by Mr. Wilberforce deserves special mention.

MISS MARGARET WILD, in her Matinée held at Princes' Hall on the 4th ult., proved herself to be a pianist of more than average attainments, both in her thoughtful reading of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110) and in pieces by Chopin and Moszkowski, in all of which she manifested qualities which should entitle her to a prominent place in the profession. The lady was also associated with and ably seconded by Miss Emily Shinner (violin) in Schumann's Sonata in Aminor (Op. 105) and Grieg's Sonata in

THE second triennial Oratorio Festival took place at Peterborough Cathedral, on Thursday, the 4th ult., under the conductorship of the Organist, Dr. Keeton. The works chosen were, in the afternoon, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and in the evening, Spohr's, "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The solo portions were allotted to Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Kenningham, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Thurley Beale; and the band, under the leadership of Mr. A. Burnett, comprised many of our leading orchestral players. Dr. Bridge, of Westminster Abbey, presided at the organ in the afternoon, and Mr. C. Hancock, Mus. Bac., of St. Martin's, Leicester, in the evening. The choir was formed of picked voices from Peterborough and the neighbourhood, and much of the success of the Festival is due to the admirable manner in which the choral portions had been prepared under Dr. Keeton's direction. In the "Last Judgment" especially, the choruses were faultlessly rendered, both as regards maintenance of pitch and the most careful and delicate attention to light and shade. It was found impossible, owing to the lateness of the hour, to go through the whole of the "Hymn of Praise"; so the Symphony (finely played by the band), the duet "I waited for the Lord," and the concluding chorus, were the only portions attempted. A special word of praise is due to Miss Anna Williams; and the efforts of Dr. Keeton, the Rev. W. P. Holmes, and others of the committee, to secure for Peterborough a musical treat worthy of its Cathedral, were fully acknowledged in the satisfaction expressed by the numbers attending the Festival.

FROM an American correspondent we have an interesting account of the consecration of the Stewart Memorial Cathedral, which took place, with most imposing rites, on the 2nd ult. The magnificence of the gift by Mrs. Stewart to the diocese being an event in the history of the Episcopal Church on Long Island, a great crowd gathered at Garden City early in the day, but only those with tickets could be admitted. The line of procession passed through the cloister and around the Cathedral, singing the processional hymn "Christ is made the sure foundation." When the tower door was reached the advance countermarched, permitting the bishops and the clergy to enter the edifice in the reverse order of the march. When the choir steps were reached the processional hymn was succeeded by the consecration psalm, which Bishop Littlejohn and the choir intoned in alternate verses. The Bishop then passed within the chancel and took his seat, whereupon Mrs. Stewart arose, and taking the arm of Judge Hilton, advanced to the chancel, where, with her own hand, she presented to the Bishop the instruments of donation and endowment. The documents contained the deed of conveyance of the Cathedral and a bond for 300,000 dollars, to secure the annual payment of 15,000 dollars as endowment. As the deeds were handed to the Bishop and laid upon the altar, the Cathedral bells rang twelve o'clock, a salute of cannon was fired by the St. Paul's cadets, and the grand organ pealed forth the accompaniment to the Doxology.

An interesting Recital was given on the 5th ult., at Princes' Hall, under the auspices of Mr. Carrodus and Mr. Stephen Kemp, to a fairly numerous and highly appreciative audience. The judiciously selected programme opened with a performance of Dvorák's Sonata in F (Op. 57), for pianoforte and violin, and concluded with Beethoven's early Sonata in E flat for the same instruments, both having been done full justice to by the Concert givers.

Mr. Carrodus again proved his absolute mastery over his instrument in Bach's Chaconne, a test-piece to any performer as every musician knows, and in Ernst's somewhat obsolete "Rondo Papageno" (the latter encored) Mr. Kemp's admirable rendering of Weber's Sonata in A flat (Op. 3g), made us regret the neglect into which the four grand Sonatas of that genial composer have of late been suffered to fall; the pianist also contributing pieces by Thalberg, Chopin, and Sterndale Bennett, and obtaining, like his coadjutor, a well-deserved encore. instrumental numbers were pleasingly relieved by vocal contributions on the part of the Misses Eddison, Ridgway, and F major (Op. 8) for pianoforte and violin. Miss Carlotta Dwelley. Messrs. Ernest Ford and J. Carrodus, jun., were efficient accompanists.

THE fifth triennial Musical Festival at Bristol will take place on October 20, 21, 22, and 23, at the Colston Hall. In honour of the bi-centenary of Handel's birth the programmes will commence and conclude with a work of this master; the band will number eighty performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Halle, and the following eminent vocalists have been engaged: Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Robert Hilton, and Mr. Santley. The outline programme announces that on Tuesday morning will be given Handel's "Belshazzar," and in the evening, Brahms's "Triumphlied"; on Wednesday morning, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and evening, C. H. Lloyd's Cantata, "Hero and Leander," with orchestral and vocal selections; on Thursday morning, Berlioz's "Faust," and evening, a Concert, including a Symphony, &c., and on Friday morning Handel's "Messiah." The choir, numbering 385, has been in constant practice since the last Festival, under Mr. D. W. Rootham, and it is confidently anticipated that, in every respect, the meeting will prove a great success.

THE band and chorus of ladies known as the St. Cecilia Society, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, gave their sixth public Concert on the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall. There was a very numerous attendance, in which the friends of the fair executants were evidently largely represented. Looked upon in the light of an experiment, the undertaking in question is decidedly interesting and instructive, and it would be almost invidious, therefore, to criticise the present shortcomings, both in the ensemble and the general quality of tone of the orchestral body. A year or two more of combined efforts may work wonders in that direction. The chorus, on the other hand, presents a very fair specimen of a well-trained English female choir, and reflects great credit on the efforts bestowed upon the Society by its Conductor. Among the specially effective performances of the latter we may mention the chorus "Glad serenades" from Dr. Stanford's "Elegiac Ode," which obtained the distinction of an encore. The graceful performance on the part of the orchestra of a Larghetto and Minuet, by Boccherini, also deserves special mention. Miss Louise Phillips, Madame Isabel Fassett, and Miss Emily Lawson contributed vocal solos; Mr. Malcolm Lawson officiating as accompanist, in addition to his wielding the bâton.

On the 9th ult. Mrs. A. J. Layton gave her fourth annual Concert at the Onslow Hall, South Kensington. The first part of the programme consisted of Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater" for female voices. The performance was listened to throughout with evident enjoyment, every number being warmly applauded. Mrs. Layton conducted the work, and solos and choruses were sung by her own pupils. Perhaps the finest effort of the choir was the fugal chorus "Fac at ardeat cor meum," which was enthusiastically received. The accompaniments were played by a small string band, as originally arranged by the master himself; and at the close Mrs. Layton was warmly recalled to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience, who showed the utmost appreciation of this much neglected work. The second part was miscellaneous, and included Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, played by Mrs. Layton (who was again recalled); an Intermezzo for strings by Churchill Sibley, conducted by the composer; and the Overture to "Haydée" (Auber). The vocalists were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Alfred J. Mayers, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton, whose contributions to the programme were interesting and well rendered.

A VERY successful Concert was given by Miss Edith Aloof on Monday evening, the 1st ult., at Brixton Hall. The bönficiairs was supported in the vocal portion of the programme by Miss Marianne Fenna, Madame Poole, Miss Spenser Jones, Mr. A. Thompson, Mr. Lansmere, and Mr. F. Bevan. Solos for the pianoforte and violin respectively, were ably performed by Miss Alice Aloof and Mr. Ernest Crooke, who were also associated in Handel's Sonata in A. Miss E. Aloof sang Rossini's "Una voce poco fa" and Gounod's "The Worker," both contributions meeting with expressions of warm approbation. Mr. George Raiemond recited, and Mr. H. J. Leipold accompanied.

AN Evening Concert was given in Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, on Saturday, the 6th ult, by Mr. Vaughan Edwardes and Mr. Frank Arnold, assisted by Miss Eleanor Rees, Miss Farnol, and Mr. Orlando Harley, with Mr. Izard, Mr. Ernest Ford, and Mr. Oliver King at the pianoforte. The programme included several classical selections, the most noticeable being Brahms's Sonata in G and Bach's Chaconne and Fantaisis and Fugue in G minor. The first was very ably performed by Mr. Frank Arnold and Mr. Izard, and Mr. Oliver King played Bach's Fugue with true musical feeling, eliciting hearty applause. Miss Eleanor Rees sang "The Wedding Day" (Blumenthal) and a new song by Stephen Adams, "I dare you to forget") and Miss Farnol and Mr. Edwardes gave a new duet, "Over the Heather," by Mr. F. Moir. Mr. Edwardes's excellent voice was displayed to advantage in Gounod's "Nazareth" and "When Passion's Trance" (M.V.White), and Mr. Harley gave a good rendering of Clay's "I'll-sing thee songs of Araby."

A SUCCESSFUL Concert was given, on the roth ult., by Miss Marie Middleton, at 54, Lancaster Gate, Hyde Park, the residence of Colonel and Mrs. T. Welldon. The bênéficiaire possesses a good mezzo-soprano voice, and has cultivated a style of vocalisation founded on our best English models. The songs selected, though not of an ambitious nature, gave good opportunity for the display of her talents, Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Outcry," accompanied by the composer, being rendered with much feeling, and Gounod's "Berceuse" so well sung as to earn a well-merited tribute of applause. Mr. Joseph Tapley gave, with much pathos, songs by Tito Mattei and Goring Thomas. Miss Eleanor Farnol, Miss Gill Smith, Mr. Frank Moir, and Mr. Henry Blower also contributed vocal pieces, the only instrumental items in the programme being two solos for violoncello, admirably played by Mr. Edmund Woolhouse.

On Friday, the 5th ult., the members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 197th monthly Concert, in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday. The part-songs, especially those in the second part of the programme, were well given by the choir, and included compositions by G. W. Martin, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, Sir H. R. Bishop, Sir Julius Benedict, Sir R. P. Stewart, and H. H. Pierson. At the Conductor's request the audience refrained from applauding Sir Julius Benedict's "Hunting Song," the lamented death of the composer having taken place but a few hours before. The soloists were Miss Maud Leslie, Miss Mary Mackway, Miss Edith Phillips, Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Charles Strong, Mr. Walter Mackway, Mr. A. Marsh, and Mr. Charles Copland. Mr. F. R. Kinkee very ably presided at the pianoforte.

An interesting Invitation Concert was given by Colonel Henry Mapleson at St. James's Hall, on Friday evening, the rath ult. The following eminent artists assisted: Madame Marie Roze, Miss Kate Flinn, Madame Lablache, Mdlle. Desvignes, Signor Marini, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Signor Carpi, Mr. Arthur Oswald, Signor Novara, Mr. John Thomas (harp), Signor Papini (violin), M. Albert (cello), and Signor Tito Mattei (pianoforte). Selections were played by the band of the Scots Guards, under the direction of Mr. J. P. Clarke; and the duties of accompanist were shared by Signor Arditi, Signor Bisaccia, Mr. Edwin Bending, and Herr Wilhelm Ganz. During the evening Dr. Carter Moffat delivered a brief address respecting his invention, the "Ammoniaphone."

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 160th Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 19th ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music. The solo vocalists were Mdme. Agnes Ross, Mr. A. J. Reynolds, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Among the instrumental items were quartets by Mrs. Pontz, Mr. Pontz, Mr. P. H. Lait, and Mr. J. D. D. Mackenzie, and Duets for two pianofortes, including "Homage to Handel," by Mrs. P. P. Frame and Mr. Algernon Rose. Among the part-music may be mentioned "Come live with me" (Bennett), "Lord Ullin's Daughter" (Prescot), "The sands of Dee" (Macfarren), and "The Norse King's Bride" (Trousselle). Mrs. Frame accompanied and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

A COMPLIMENTARY benefit Concert, organised by a committee of gentlemen connected with St. Paul's Church, Forest Hill, was given to the organist and choirmaster, Mr. J. H. Maunder, on Tuesday evening, the 2nd ult., at the Forester's Hall. The principal item in the programme was a comic operetta, composed by the binificiaire, entitled "Daisy Dingle," the book being written by Mr. H. J. Dakin. The parts were effectively supported by Mr. Henry Baker, Miss Laura Dakin, Miss Nellie Dakin (Mrs. Maunder), and Mr. Herbert Reeves. A pianoforte solo was contributed by Miss Mortimer, and Mr. G. H. Snazelle was an excellent reciter. The Concert was most successful throughout, Mr. Maunder being warmly called forward on the conclusion of his work.

The examiners for the preliminary examination' for the degree of Bachelor of Music and special examination in music for the ordinary B.A. degree at Cambridge University (Professor Macfarren, Dr. Heap, and Mr. T. P. Hudson) have issued the following class list:—Class I. (in order of merit)—Hannaford, non-collegiate; Mayo, non-collegiate; and Wheeldon, non-collegiate, equal. Class II. (in alphabetical order).—Belcher, King's; R. S. Davies, St. John's; Draycott, non-collegiate; Green, St. John's; Herring, B.A., Jesus; Liddle, non-collegiate; Piggott, non-collegiate; Rolfe, non-collegiate; Wheddon, non-collegiate. Women: Class II., S. J. Bryne.

The list of works performed at the Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Georg Henschel, during the three Winter seasons of 1881 to 1884, at the Music Hall, Boston, Mass., U.S.A., shows that not only compositions of the highest class have been selected, but that they have included specimens of the most varied schools and epochs. Auber, Bach, Beethoven, Sterndale Bennett, Berlioz, Boccherini, Brahms, Cherubini, Chopin, F. H. Cowen, Dvorák, Gluck, Gounod, Handel, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mozart, Raff, Rossini, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr, Wagner, and Weber are amongst the names of those represented, some of the works having been given two or three times.

It will be observed that the University of Trinity College, Toronto, is offering its Musical Degrees as the result of simultaneous examinations, to be held in London and Toronto. Trinity College is the Church of England University of Upper Canada, and enjoys the privilege conferred by Royal Charter of granting degrees in the Faculties of Arts, Divinity, Law, Medicine, and Music. We shall watch with interest the result of this new and bold experiment. There are many capable musicians who value a musical degree; and as we are informed that the standard of merit is very high, we have little doubt that the title will be much sought after; but why not extend the system to other faculties?

Owing to Mr. Charles Hallé's numerous engagements in the north of England during the winter months he has been compelled, much to the regret of the Council, to resign the conductorship of the Sacred Harmonic Society. Mr. W. H. Cummings, however, who has hitherto acted with so much ability as assistant conductor, has been appointed to the important post, and the usual series of Concerts will commence in November. The works to be performed will include Gounod's "Mors et Vita," Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Handel's "Belshazzar," a new composition by Saint-Saëns, "The 19th Psalm," &c.

MR. RIECHELMANN'S annual Concert took place on the ard ult., in the Lecture Hall of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church, Upper George Street, of which the bineficiaire is Organist and Director of the choir. A well selected programme was excellently rendered, and thoroughly appreciated by a large audience. Miss Hope Glenn and Madame Riechelmann received well deserved applause.

THE Birmingham Clef Club has been re-started on a new basis, and will celebrate the event by a dinner on the 16th inst., to which many persons eminent in music have been invited. In the absence of Sir Arthur Sullivan, President of the Club, the chair will be occupied by Sir George Macfarren.

MR. FRANK MAJOR (Organist and Choirmaster, St. Saviour's, Chelsea) gave his fourth annual Concert on Thursday, the 17th ult., at St. Saviour's Schools, in aid of the Choir Fund of his Church. The artists were Miss Eldena Eldon, Miss Grosvenor Gooch, Miss Johanna Pietersen, Miss Florence Verey, Mr. Reginald Groome, Mr. Frank May, and Mr. Frank Major (the Conductor) as vocalists; Mr. George Wilbey, violin; Miss Ellen Leggatt and Miss Hogg, R.A.M., pianists. Miss Hogg also acted as accompanist. The Concert was, in every respect, a great success.

A CONCERT was given in Myddleton Hall, Islington, on Tuesday, the 16th ult., by Mr. A. Marsh and Mr. Arndell. The artists were Miss Foresta, Miss Frances Harrison, and Mr. Vaughan Edwardes, the last named gentleman being encored for an excellent rendering of "Revenge, Timotheus cries." Mr. Marsh, a pupil of Mr. Randegger, sang very creditably a new song, composed by Mr. Arndell, a former student of the Royal Academy of Music, and Miss Harrison rendered "Kathleen Mavourneen" in a pleasing manner. The Concert was brought to a close with Hatton's quartet "When evening's twilight."

MR. W. DE MANBY SERGISON gave his second grand Concert, under distinguished patronage, on the 2nd ult., at St. James's Hall, when an interesting miscellaneous programme was provided, including some choral numbers, well rendered by the choir of St. Peter's, Eaton Square. Among the artists taking part in the proceedings were Mesdames Agnes Larkcom, Eleanor Rees, Antoinette Sterling, Emily Shinner, and Clotilde Kleeberg; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Owen Evan Thomas, Lazarus, W. Ganz, Ernest Ford, and the Concert-giver. Mr. Clifford Harrison contributed some recitations.

In the Annual Report of the Glossop Dale Philharmonic Society, the performances of Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "The Redemption," Handel's "Jephtha," F. Hiller's "Song of Victory," and E. Prout's "Hereward" were referred to with pardonable pride by the Rev. C. B. Ward, M.A., who presided; and it was resolved to give three Concerts during the ensuing season as follows: Miscellaneous, by members only, Handel's "Messiah," and Prout's "Hereward." The first Rehearsal will take place on August 11, before which date the Secretary invites the names of any persons desirous of joining the Society.

An interesting meeting was held at the Congregational Church, Bethnal Green Road, on Monday evening, the 22nd ult., when a very handsome clock, and a purse containing 5 guineas, were presented to Mr. William West, on his resignation of the post of Organist, for a new sphere of labour at Cambridge Heath Congregational Church, Hackney. The clock bears the following inscription, "Presented to Mr. William West by the friends at Bethnal Green Road Congregational Church, in token of their love and esteem for him as their devoted Organist for 15 years. June 22nd, 1885,"

THE Free Concerts at Westminster Chapel, which have proved such an attraction, terminated, on May 29, with a full Orchestral Concert. Several works of interest were given, the chief features of the evening being a vocal Fantasia by F. K. Hattersley, excellently sung by Miss Eleanor Rees; a Pizzicato Movement for strings, by J. E. German; and an Overture by W. Shakespeare. Mr. Orlando Harley was highly successful in his solos from "The Creation" and "Elijah," and Mr. H. C. Tonking gave several organ solos with much success.

THE members of the Paddington Chapel Choral Union gave a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" in the Chapel on Tuesday evening, May 26. The solos were well sung by Mrs. Mason, Mrs. Roe, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The works were ably conducted by Mr. Moon, and Mr. H. G. Holmes was an efficient organist and accompanist.

MR. CHARLES DOWDESWELL gave a very interesting Lecture on Wagner's "Parsifal," at Messrs. Bluthner's Rooms in Kensington Gardens Square, on Friday evening, the 5th ult. In the course of the Lecture vocal and instrumental selections were well rendered from the work in question.

On Monday evening, the 15th ult., a Concert was given in the Holborn Town Hall by the choir of Holy Trinity Church, Gray's Inn Road, assisted by friends, and conducted by the Organist of Holy Trinity, Mr. R. Frederic Tyler. The programme was excellently rendered. The vocalists were Miss Grosvenor Gooch, Miss Fannie C. Atkinson, Herr Carl Bernhard, and Mr. F. W. Thorne. Violin solos were well played by Master H. Goffe, and Mr. Tyler gave an excellent rendering of a Fantasia of Morandi's on the organ. The Concert was a great success.

The usual Monthly Concert took place at the English College of Music, 304, Regent Street, on the 11th ult. The programme included amongst other items, Trio, for piano, clarinet, and viola (Beethoven); Sonata in G Minor (Tartini); and piano compositions by Bach, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Weber, and Moscheles. Special mention is due to Mr. Walter Tuddenham, whose excellent rendering of Tartini's Sonata in G minor proved him to be an artist of great ability, and to Master Reginald Henry for his pianoforte solos.

On Tuesday, the 2nd ult., Mr. E. Stroud, the Honorary Choirmaster of S. Stephen's, North Bow, was presented with a valuable diamond ring, as a mark of the appreciation of his services during the past seven years. The Vicar (the Rev. T. R. Lawrence), Mr. Churchwarden Scott, and some influential members of the congregation, testified to Mr. Stroud's musical abilities, zeal, and earnest work with the choir. Mr. Stroud suitably responded, and expressed his regret at being compelled to relinquish duties which had invariably been so pleasant to him.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, have given the following performances:—"St. Paul," in St. Peter's Church, Hackney Road, on May 27, soloists, Miss Mina Sheppard, Miss Arben, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Mendelssohn's "Athalie," in St. James's Church, Fulham, on the 77th ult., soloists, Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Annie Mallows, Mrs. Oram, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Albert Orme. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ on both occasions.

The Dedication Festival was held at St. John's Parish Church, Hackney, E., on Wednesday evening, the 24th ult. The choir was largely augmented and consisted of about 150 voices. The anthem "O clap your hands," by T. Tallis Trimnell, was most effectively rendered, the freshness and vigour of the boys' voices being especially apparent. The Service was under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., who at the commencement gave a short Recital, and at the close played Mendelssohn's Third Organ Sonata with great taste.

A SPECIAL Service, in aid of the St. Alphage Society, was held on the 2nd ult., in the Church of St. Alphage, London Wall. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was sung as the anthem, the solo and recitative being rendered with good effect by Miss Springbett. The singing of the choir was excellent; and Mr. A. C. Tattersall, the Organist, presided most efficiently at the organ. At the conclusion of the service, an Organ Recital was given by Mr. C. Warwick Jordan.

THE Misses Nellie and Kate Chaplin gave their Annual Concert at Steinway Hall on the 4th ult. The artists were Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Margaret Hoare, Mellie Arida Jenoure, Messrs. George Gear, and Orlando Harley, vocalists; Miss Kate Chaplin and Herr Pollitzer, violin; Herr Otto Leu, violoncelle; Miss Nellie Chaplin and Master W. Chisman, pianoforte. Miss Kate Chaplin gave a brilliant rendering of Vieuxtemps! Fantasic Caprice for the violin, which won enthusiastic applause.

On Saturday, the 13th ult., another of Mr. Stanley Mayo's Bijou Concerts took place at St. James's Hall. The artists, besides Mr. Stanley Mayo, were Madame Harrison (who possesses a charming voice), Mdlle. D'Orla, Miss Creswick, Mr. Godwin, and Mr. Gauntlet, all of whom were highly successful.

THE Wycliffe Chapel Choir under the direction of Mr. G. Merritt, G.T.S.C., gave a performance of Selections from Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah" at the Evening Service in Wycliffe Chapel on Sunday, May 31.

THE Members of All Saints' Choral Society brought their first season to a close by an Invitation Concert, in the School-room of All Saints' Church, Lambeth, on the 2nd ult. The programme comprised a selection of glees, partsongs, &c., all of which were well rendered. Songs were given by Miss E. Brewer, Miss Thompson, Messrs. Miles Lee, B. T. Waddams, T. Hackwell, and Arthur Robinson, the Conductor. The Misses M. and E. Brewer were the accompanists.

A SHORT Organ Recital is given after the Litany, every Friday, at 1.15, in the Church of St. Clement, Eastcheap, by Dr. Charles W. Pearce, at which an entire organ Sonata is always played as the first item. The six Sonatas of Mendelssohn have already been given, and those of Merkel entered upon. City amateurs may be interested to know that St. Clement's numbers amongst its former organists, Edward, the youngest son of Henry Purcell, and Jonathan Battishill.

Twita Victoria Glee Club closed its season with a Ladies' Invitation Concert, on Thursday, May 28, at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Victoria Street. The programme was very ably rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss E. Fenn, Miss Busk, Miss Rowsell, Mr. Sexton, Messrs. Waddams, Kessell, Dawson, Bayley, Lancaster, and Swinford; and the accompanists, Mrs. Kitchen and Mr. Frank Swinford. Mr. W. Sexton conducted.

A NEW Organ, built by Messrs. P. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield, for the Congregational Church, Lavender Hill, was opened, on Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult., by Mr. H. C. Tonking, Organist of Westminster Chapel. The vocalists were Madame Wilson-Osman and Mr. Joseph Tapley. "Noteworthy among the organ pieces was a Concert Fantasia and Fugue in C minor and major, by W. G. Wood.

THE Members of the Brixton Vocal Union gave a performance of Sir W. S. Bennett's "May Queen" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea," at the Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Monday, the 8th ult. The soloists were Miss Swinfen, Miss Medland, Mr. H. Yates, Mr. F. W. Crawley, and Mr. Thornton Colvin. Mr. A. J. Crabb presided at the organ, and Mr. T. Waldo Morell conducted. The choir and orchestra numbered about 100.

THE Members of the London Branch of the United Richard Wagner Society opened their season on Friday Evening, May 29, with a successful Conversazione at Messrs. Dowdeswell's Art Galleries in Bond Street. Selections, instrumental and vocal, from Wagner's works formed a feature of the entertainment. The executants were Mr. Walter Bache and a group of artists, under the direction of Mr. Dalgety Henderson.

Mr. Frederick S. Oram writes to say that he has been elected to the Conductorship of the "Tottenham Orchestral Society," and not to the "Musical Society" as announced in our last number, he having held the post of Conductor to the last named institution for the past five years.

DR. STAINER'S sacred Cantata "St. Mary Magdalen" will be sung (with orchestral accompaniment) at the Dedication Festival at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, on Monday, the 6th inst. The service commences at 5 p.m.

A STUDENTS' Invitation Concert was given at Trinity College, London, on the 9th ult., when the programme contained a Quintet by Miss Marie Brooke (student) and a melody by Paque, arranged for four violoncellos.

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN sailed for New York, in the Etruria, on the 20th ult. The object of his journey is to visit some relatives who are living in California. He expects to return in August.

MR. JOSEPH BENNETT has accepted an invitation to lecture on "Beethoven—Man and Musician," before the members of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, in December next.

On Friday evening, the 12th ult., Mr. Ferdinand Praeger delivered an interesting Lecture on "Wagner as a Moralist," in connection with the Wagner Society, at Messrs. Blüthner's Rooms, Kensington Gardens Square.

Mr. Sinclair Dunn, R.A.M., was presented by the members of the Society of Science, Letters, and Art with their gold medal on the 16th ult.

REVIEWS.

Die Reform der Oper durch Gluck, und R. Wagner's Kunstwerk der Zukunft. Von C. H. Bitter. [Braunschweig: F. Vieweg and Sohn.]

HERR BITTER, the Prussian minister of State and author of a meritorious Life of Bach (since eclipsed, however, by Spitta's monumental work on the same subject) is no believer in the theories propounded by Richard Wagner; still less an admirer of the self-asserting personality of the late Bayreuth reformer himself. Hero-worship, such as that freely bestowed upon the poet-composer, is a thing he has no patience with. The fact of a German writer having recently presumed to draw a parallel, from a national point of view, between the work achieved by Wagner and by Bismarck, in their respective spheres, appears to his official mind little less than an insult offered to the "perhaps greatest statesman of all times." Substitute the word "poet-composer" for that of "statesman," and we have an accurate definition of the chief article of faith contained in the gospel of the ultra-Wagnerian as regards his own idol. Herr Bitter evidently draws the line of permissible hero-worship at statesmen. The heroes of Art are to be patronised certainly, even by such exalted personages; but to mention the creator of an Empire in the same breath with the creator of, say, half-a-dozen operatic works of inspired genius-why, the thing is an absurdity! But perhaps we are doing an injustice to the author of the present volume, which all through its pages tends to the glorification of a mere musician, Christoph Willibald Gluck, at the expense, however, of another, Richard Wagner. While yielding nothing to Herr Bitter in the matter of appreciation of the merits and achievements of the composer of "Armida," and of the two "Iphigenias, and admitting a certain specious interest attaching to the close upon two hundred pages devoted to the forerunners of Gluck in the development of opera-viz., Handel, Lully, Rameau, Graun, Hasse, and Traëtta (a selection, by the way, scarcely representative enough to illustrate the subject) we are bound to say that the remaining portions of this volume, those devoted to the demolishing of Wagner's "theories," are tedious in the extreme. Wagner's theoretical writings, more especially those against which the shafts of Herr Bitter's dialectics are directed ("Kunstwerk der Zukunft," "Oper und Drama," "Kunst und Politik") preceded nearly all the more mature practical demonstrations of his unique genius. It is with these, with "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal," that musicians and amateurs alike are now, and will be for some time to come, concerned, when the volumes containing the poet-composer's theoretical notions will have been consigned to the dusty oblivion of the upper shelves of our libraries. Indeed, notwithstanding the numerous grains of gold to be found in these writings, they have already been practically "shelved," while the influence of Wagner's ideal conception of the music-drama, his style, and even his mannerism, have become living and more or less powerful agents in the production of similar works in the present Under these circumstances, the task of exposing the fallacies of the theoretical and polemical Wagner, and of reminding the reader again and again of the large measure of human weakness entering into the composition of a master-mind whose very existence makes us feel proud of our common humanity, this task we say, however congenial to the present author, has become a superfluous one as regards the musical world generally. It is by his musicdramas, and not by his theories and occasional ill-advised literary onslaughts, that the Bayreuth reformer will be judged by an impartial posterity. "I know," says Herr Bitter, in one of his concluding chapters, "I know, that very few persons, be they musicians or otherwise, have read Wagner's writings." We may put on record our unqualified belief as to the correctness of this assertion, without at the same time ceasing to wonder at the raison d'être of the present volume, under these circumstances.

Practical Notes on Harmony and Counterpoint; for Junior Pupils. By D. J. Burns. [Wood and Co.]

"By giving explanations," says the author of this work, task, we come in the form of short notes, in a concise, and it is to be of teachers.

hoped, in as clear a manner as possible, the study of this formidable subject is disarmed of many of its seeming difficulties to the youthful student." Assuredly the theory difficulties to the youthful student." Assuredly the theory of music is a "formidable subject"; but up to the present day the preface to every work designed to make it easier tells us that it is written to "supply a want," so that it is evident this "want" still exists. We have now only to consider whether Mr. Burns has rendered any future attempts in this direction unnecessary. At page II he tells us that "there is no satisfactory reason why some intervals are called perfect," and immediately says that they remain perfect when inverted, and that they cannot be increased or lessened without becoming discords. These, we should imagine, would be considered very satisfactory reasons. At page 35 the chord of the Dominant Ninth is given, and the student is told that as the root is omitted in the four inversions of the ninth, the chords "become secondary sevenths," that they are resolved in the same manner as the Dominant Seventh, but must be prepared. Now of course all theorists believe that fundamental harmonies having the dominant for their root, require no preparation at all; and moreover that prepared secondary sevenths resolve a fourth upwards. Curiously enough, too, the preparation given as an example in the book is that of a discord of suspension. At page 42 it is said that the chord of the 5-2 is the "first inversion of the suspended fourth." Surely this chord (with the suspended note in the bass) is the third inversion. Then in the explanation of the "German sixth," at page 45, the chord is resolved on the dominant harmony in consecutive perfect fifths, a fault always avoided by resolving it to the six-four on the dominant. We might multiply instances of faults such as we have here pointed out; but prefer now to refer to very many portions of the work in which the explanations are clearly laid down and in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. Amongst these we include the whole of the remarks upon the triad and its inversions, the rules for writing harmony in parts, and, as far as they go, the directions for working counterpoint. As Mr. Burns, in his preface, alludes to "the excellent and exhaustive treatises by native and foreign musicians with which the musical literature of our day abounds," and to which he designs his book to be an introduction, we are the more surprised at our points of disagreement, for we really know of no one work which supports him in his opinions. It is possible he may be induced to revise the book, and, if so, we shall be glad to see it; as, although we differ from him in so many of his tenets, he has a right to full credit for his good intentions and earnestness.

Charles Hallé's Musical Library. Appendix to his "Practical Pianoforte School." Section I. Elementary; Section II. Easy. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THE success of the new edition of Mr. Hallé's "Practical Pianoforte School" has, we are told, been so decisive that a new edition of the "Musical Library" as an Appendix to the first-named work has been issued, and the whole of the numbers in the two Sections already published are now before us. One more Section, containing pieces "Moderately difficult," is promised, and each Section will contain the same number of pieces, and of the same degree of difficulty as in the first three Sections of the "Pianoforte School." All these facts are announced on the cover of each piece, and, as far as we can see, the conditions have been faithfully fulfilled. The elementary pieces in the first Section are slightly progressive in difficulty; and all are by authors whose names are a guarantee for their value as aids to education. In the second Section we have many numbers already known to young players-such as the Sonatinas of Kuhlau, Dussek, Pleyel, &c .- and also several almost forgotten pieces, for the revival of which we are much indebted to the editor. Considering that such compositions as Mozart's Sonata in C minor, Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," and Mozart's "Posthumous Rondo" in B flat are often termed "easy" by juvenile pupils who cannot even play a scale, it seems necessary that a classification of degrees in difficulty should be made for the use of schools; and as the experience of so eminent a pianist as Mr. Hallé renders him especially fitted for the task, we cordially commend this collection to the attention

Lieder und Gesänge. Songs. Composed by Gerard F. Cobb. [Augener and Co.]

THESE six songs are a valuable contribution to our rapidly increasing store of artistic vocal music. They are written for a baritone or mezzo-soprano voice, either to German words translated into English by the composer, or to English words translated into German by C. Wald-They vary much in importance, but are nearly equal in merit, some of the shorter pieces, indeed, being charmingly sympathetic settings of the poetry. No. 1, "Bird upon the branch alighting," is quite a little pianoforte sketch, with vocal accompaniment; but, unlike many of the imitations of the German lieder which have come before us, the two parts are so indissolubly united as to render neither unduly prominent. No. 2, "Thou glance enchanting, wilt thou fathom," has a most melodious theme, to which some attractive figures in the accompaniment lend additional effect. No. 3, "Entreaty," although only sixteen bars long, is wedded to an appealing subject, accompanied throughout with appropriate placidity; No. 4, "O wind that blows out of the west," like the first song on our list, has an elaborated pianoforte part which seems to grow naturally from the feeling of the words, and may very probably, both with the vocalist and pianist, prove one of the most popular of the set; No. 5, "The Death Bed," is a setting of Hood's beautiful verses, commencing "We watch'd her breathing thro' the night," the simple pathos of which has been thoroughly caught by the composer; and No. 6, "The morn hath not the glory that it wore," a Meditation for voice and piano, most successfully concludes a group of vocal poems which, even in these over-productive days, cannot fail to command attention.

The Amateur and Professional Artist at the Pianoforte. By Forsey Brion. [Hutchings and Romer.]

WE cannot say that there is anything new in this little treatise; but the observations throughout are not only extremely sensible, but evidently spring from a long practical experience of the legitimate resources of the pianoforte and an intimate knowledge of the works written for that instrument by the great masters of the art. "Digital facility," the author truly says, "has in the present day run riot with pianists, while Expression and the laws of Phrasing and Rhythm are so little regarded that the lack of observation of these delicacies in music, together with an almost utter ignorance of Harmony, constitutes the wide gulf that separates the Amateur and Professional pianist." This is the text upon which Mr. Brion discourses, giving rules for the guidance of those pianists who are desirous of understanding, as well as of playing, the standard compositions, and explaining the true meaning of the marks by which a composer conveys his intentions to those who undertake to interpret his works. We do not, however, agree with the author's observations upon the relative effects of staccato signs; for we certainly hold the opinion that the round dots indicate a heavier touch than what he terms the "elongated mark"; but there are so many good points in the work that we will not dwell upon the few which we think open to discussion.

The Great Musicians. Edited by Francis Huester. Joseph Haydn. By Pauline D. Townsend. [Sampson Low, Marston, Searle and Rivington.]

This biography, by the accomplished translator of Jahn's "Mozart," may be conscientiously recommended as a reliable account of the career of a composer whose bene-ficial influence upon the progress of instrumental music should not be allowed to pass from our memory. The authoriess frankly acknowledges her indebtedness to Herr C. F. Pohl's great work on Haydn, and also quotes her further authorities on all matters of fact contained in the volume, the list of the composer's works being mainly based upon that in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." We may say, however, that although the "matters of fact" are, as they should be, vouched for by the best authorities, there is very much original writing in the volume which all musical readers will find both interesting and instructive. The character of the composer is exceedingly well sketched, and the main incidents of his life—especially his two journeys to London —are most graphically told. In view of the monument to Haydn, about to be erected in Vienna, this book should be cordially welcomed in England; for it is earnestly hoped by the promoters of the undertaking that the many lovers of the master in this country will liberally contribute towards the expenses of this tribute to his memory.

2ième Sonate Romantique. Pour Pianoforte. Par Eugen Woycke. [C. Jefferys.]

"THE real and proper use of the word 'Romantic,'" says Mr. Ruskin, "is simply an improbable or unaccustomed degree of beauty, sublimity or virtue." that this definition will scarcely apply to the piece before us; for certainly the "degree of beauty" to be discovered by a careful search through the four movements into which it is divided, is very much less than we are accustomed to, even in the works of the crude imitators of what it is the fashion to call the "advanced school" of writing. Indeed the composition is so completely disconnected that it sounds like the improvisation of one who aims at astonishing his hearers by a series of passages, between each of which they may mentally place a double bar. We do not say that there are no musical ideas scattered through the Sonata; but they are speedily stifled, as if the composer were fearful of degenerating into the "classical," and thus betraying his want of power to sustain the "romantic" character he aims at. The Intermezzo, marked "Andantino con anima," is, in our opinion, the best considered movement in the work; and the Adagio starts with a subject which raises expectation, doomed, however, to disappointment when the harsh chromatic progression at the "Poco animato" occurs. The first and last movements are, to us, incomprehensible as component portions of a piece which, by its name, suggests design, even when the severity of such design is presumed to be tempered by the addition of the term "Romantic."

Fourth Tarantella in E flat. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Macfarren. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE multiplication of Dance Music in the present day will lead students to the consideration of how much we owe to this form of composition in our modern works. The marked rhythmical character of all music written for dancing purposes, it is well known, prompted many of our best writers to mould their ideas into this shape; and Weber, Chopin, and even Beethoven, have left us undying specimens of these pieces, not with fanciful titles designed to disguise this fact from ambitious pianists, but with the names of the dances which they represent boldly stated by the composer. Amongst the number of artists who have plentifully contributed to the store of such works for our household instrument, no one has been more successful than Mr. Walter Macfarren, whose fourth Tarantella, now before us, will certainly not only sustain but add to his reputation. The light and tripping principal subject is well contrasted with subordinate themes, the passages lie throughout well under the hand, and the varieties of touch will be found extremely useful for practice.

Handel's Choruses for the Organ. Arranged by Henry Smart. Nos. 22, 23, and 24. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

SMART'S transcriptions gained so much acceptance with organists during the musician's lifetime, that it is surprising we should have had to wait so long for the present examples, which are not likely to prove less useful than the earlier numbers. They are arrangements of "How excellent," from "Saul," "Blest be the man," from "Joseph," and the Coronation Anthem, "My heart is inditing." In each instance the transcription is effective, sufficient fullness of harmony being given without too much doubling of the parts or needless piling up of difficulties.

I cannot but linger. Song by John Nicholson.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THOUGH but a sentimental ballad of the ordinary pattern, this may be commended as somewhat above the average of its class. The melody is pleasing and expressive, and the accompaniment something more than a series of commonplace arpeggios. The song is written for second tenor or baritone voice.

Vierteljahrsschrift für Musik - Wissenschaft. Herausgegeben von Friedrich Chrysander und Philipp Spitta; redigirt von Guido Adler.

[Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel. 1885.]

A QUARTERLY musical journal issued under the auspices of the well-reputed biographers respectively of Handel and Bach, should command the attention and support of all English amateurs conversant with the German language. The new periodical is practically a resuscitation in a more popular form of the late excellent, but somewhat too aristocratically exclusive publication entitled "Jahrbücher für musikalische Wissenschaft," whereof Herr Chrysander was the editor. In its present first number, the "Vierteljahrsschrift" gives an earnest of the high standard at which it aims, and of the general interest attaching to its pages, as exemplified in a prefatory article by the editor, "On the Study of Musical Science," followed by some very interesting and instructive remarks on "Ancient Hindoo Music in connection with Religious Sacrifices," from the pen of Herr Chrysander. As a relief to the very learned treatise by the latter author, Herr Spitta adds a highly entertaining and no less instructive discourse anent some peculiar phases in the development of the German Volkslied during the eighteenth century; this being by far the most elaborate paper in the present number. Critical and bibliographical observations complete the contents of the new Quarterly, to which, in the best interests of the art itself, we heartily wish every success.

The Te Deum, Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis in D. By B. Agutter. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE is a note on the title-page of this Service stating that orchestral parts may be obtained. The expectations of an elaborate accompaniment which this announcement arouses are duly fulfilled. Perhaps the most distinguishing feature of the work is the prominence, and even difficulty, of the organ part. The writing for the voices is so simple that an indifferent choir could master it with ease, but Mr. Agutter revels in florid and chromatic passages for the organ which, interpreted by an able executant, would doubtless be extremely effective. Old-fashioned church musicians may possibly shudder at some of his progressions, as, for example, in the eighth and ninth bars of the symphony to the Magnificat. Speaking generally, his Service may be taken as a sign of the times. It is difficult, if not impossible, for a composer who confines himself to ordinary four-part writing to infuse any freshness into his work. But even as in large compositions intended for the concertroom or the theatre, the orchestra is now made to pursue an independent course, so Mr. Agutter may prove a pioneer in the path of new developments in Service music. to how far it is advisable to travel along the road he has indicated we express no opinion at present. The subject is a wide one and capable of being discussed from many points of view.

Sonatina for the Organ. By Arthur B. Plant.

Andante for the Organ. By Seymour Smith.

[Weekes and Co.]

MR. PLANT modestly describes his work as a Sonatina, but it is in three movements, the first of which is developed at some length, and in regular Sonata form. In this section the influence of Mozart is perceptible, while the final fughetta is suggestive of Handel. Here and there a little crudeness is perceptible, but on the whole the Sonatina is pleasing, and makes no great demands on the skill of executants. Mr. Seymour Smith's Andante is a trifle, containing a very tuneful, if somewhat secular, melody, accompanied in the style of a simple ballad. It is within the means of elementary players.

Album of Duets for Violin and Piano. By Arthur Carnall, Mus. Bac., Cantab. [W. Morley and Co.]

THE immense increase in the study of the violin has caused a demand for easy music, suitable as introductory to the works of the great masters. The four little pieces in the present volume are adapted to the needs of elementary players, being tuneful and pleasing, as well as exceedingly simple, the violin part being throughout in the first position.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 37-44.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

If original compositions for the organ do not eventually supersede arrangements it will not be owing to any lack of the former, for musicians are supplying the material at a rapid rate. The first three numbers of the present series contain extremely well-written pieces in various styles by Mr. B. Luard Selby. These are all effective, but we give the preference to No. 39, a Postlude in D, in what may be termed the Handelian style modernised. Praise must also be awarded to No. 40, a somewhat elaborate movement andante grazioso, by Dr. C. S. Heap. This would prove effective at recitals. Nos. 41 to 44 consist of pieces by Mr. Berthold Tours, taken from the Organist's Quarterly Yournal. The name of the composer is almost sufficient to ensure their favourable reception by organists, and expectations will not be disappointed. The most important of the set is a Fantasia in C, No. 41, a brilliant and showy piece, though not too secular for church use. A melodious and piquant Allegretto, No. 42, and a lively Postlude, No. 44, are also certain to please.

Sarabande and Gavotte in A minor. For the Pianoforte. Composed by A. W. Whitehead.

The rage for writing these old dance tunes seems still on the increase; and we may presume, therefore, that the market for them, although tolerably well supplied by this time, is not overstocked. Of course, when a composer has anything to say worth hearing, we do not much care what form he chooses for his medium of communication; but merely smooth and faultless music acquires no additional force by being cast in the shape of Gavottes, Sarabandes and other relics of a past age. Mr. Whitehead's two unpretentious pieces are neither better nor worse than the many modern imitations of the style of the old masters which have preceded them; but there is nothing which stamps the slightest individuality upon either composition. The harmonies, however, are appropriate, and carefully written throughout; sufficiently so, indeed, to make us believe that when the composer relies entirely upon himself, he may be more successful.

The Child's way to Heaven. Song. Written by the Authoress of "The Dove on the Cross," &c. Composed by William Carter. [Playfair and Co.]

WE cannot too strongly protest against the maudlin sentimental style of music, a specimen of which is furnished by the song before us. "'Oh, I am weary of earth,' said the child,"—the first line of this composition— "'Oh, I am weary of certainly prepares the mind of the hearer for what is to follow; but what does follow is not only unpleasing, but unnatural. It is unnecessary to repeat the tale which tells us of the manner in which the child finds its "way to Heaven"; for this has been treated ad nauseam by poets who write "lines for music"; but the little creature kneeling down "on the damp green sod," and praying to be taken from a world the many beauties of which should fill its mind to overflowing with joyfulness and love is scarcely a scene, we think, to be vividly placed before a happy drawing-room audience, or a healthy English home. The music follows the words with due English home. sympathy. We have the minor key where pathos is called for, and the conventional arpeggios come in at the proper time. The authoress of "The Dove on the Cross," at least, cannot complain that her poetry has not received an appropriate musical colouring.

Slumber, beloved. From the "Christmas Oratorio." Composed by J. S. Bach. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THANKS to the untiring efforts of the rapidly increasing number of Bach lovers in this country, not only the instrumental, but the vocal works of this composer are becoming tolerably familiar to English amateurs. To those still unacquainted with the lovely Slumber Song now before us we cordially commend it as the most appropriate music for the Christmas season. The study of such compositions is the best antidote to the ephemeral music of the day; and we cannot too much impress upon teachers the desirability of introducing them to their pupils.

Six Offertoires for the Organ. By Léfebure-Wély, Op. 34. judged merely by a standard of respectible mediocrity, the great variety presented by their respective referrings.

A NEW set of Offertoires by this most popular of French composers is certain to be warmly welcomed, more especially as its appearance comes in the nature of a surprise. It is stated on the title-page that the original French edition of these pieces has two staves only. The editor, Mr. James Partridge, has adapted them to English organs and has provided a pedal part, which, it may be said, is more important than Wély was wont to write himself. The belief is expressed that these Offertoires "will be found to be as interesting and effective as the well-known set, Op. 35." We confess to being unable to share this view, but, at the same time, the new set contains a good deal of taking music. Nos. I and 2 are weak, trivial, and monotonous, but the rest are pleasing, and Nos. 4 and 6 have all the elements of popularity, the first of these two being especially tuneful and spirited.

The Office of the Holy Communion in D. By E. H. Ryde. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

This is another complete setting of the eucharistic service, including the Benedictus and Agnus Dei. It is written so as to be equally suitable for singing in four-part harmony or in unison. Mr. Ryde appears to be a disciple of Spohr, his sensuous chromatic harmonies frequently reminding us of the Cassel composer. Thus at the very opening—that is, in the Kyrie—we have the chords of the dominant seventh of G, C, B, E, A, and D in succession. Such a passage as this becomes more monotonous when repeated ten times than bold diatonic progressions. The same objection, of course, does not apply to the other portions of the service, and the setting, as a whole, is calculated to please in places where modern tendencies in the matter of Church-music are in favour.

The Offertory Sentences. Set to Music by Lovell Phillips.
[E. Donajowski.]

THERE is no rubrical authority for setting the Offertory Sentences to music, but the practice is now too general for any objections to be successfully urged, and the version of Mr. Lovel! Phillips must therefore be judged on its abstract musical merits. From this point of view he has done well, as in the majority of instances he has managed to combine church-like feeling with artistic effect, at the same time preserving simplicity of structure in the setting of every sentence.

God who madest earth and heaven. Anthem for men's voices. By Harvey Löhr, [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. Löhr has already given ample proofs of his talent as a composer, but to those who are unacquainted with his previous efforts this anthem will convey a sufficiently favourable impression. It consists of four-part chorus interspersed with brief passages for tenor solo. The former is hymn-like in structure, but the latter is flowing and expressive, with just a touch of the sensuous feeling characteristic of French ecclesiastical music.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Berlin Opera-house closed its doors for the summer vacation on the 12th ult., after a performance of "Lohengin." During the operatic year just completed, extending from August, 1884, to the above date, there have been two hundred and forty-nine performances of opera at the establishment in question, which gives an average of nearly six per week. Bearing in mind the fact that the political capital of Germany does not, as yet, exercise any appreciable influence upon the analogous institutions of the Country at large, a retrospective view of the independent activity of the various other German theatres (residential or otherwise) during a season, as regards the diffusion of a general acquaintance with operatic literature, would doubtless prove both interesting and instructive to English amateurs to whom, under present circumstances, the opportunity of hearing little more than some half-dozen operatic works is vouchsafed during a season. Space does not, however, permit us to furnish even a summary of the results achieved by German theatres in this direction. Even if the great variety presented by their respective répertoires affords an immeasurable advantage to the German musical student over his English confrères, so long as a practical acquaintance of the masterpieces of the lyrical stage is to be considered a necessary adjunct to musical education. Nor should the fact be ignored that the performances of not a few of the German operatic establishments-notably those of Munich, Dresden, and Hamburg-will bear comparison with those of any other lyrical stage in Europe. Returning to the repertoire of the Berlin Opera during the season indicated, and which we adopt for the nonce as representative of the activity displayed by similar establishments of the Fatherland, we are indebted to Herr Ferdinand Gumbert, of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung, for the following statistics relative to composers, the number of their works, and the aggregate performances, viz.:-

Richard Wagner 42 productions of 7 operas. Victor Nessler .. 28 2.2 Lortzing 20 C. M. von Weber 19 4 Mozart 16 2.2 4 Meyerbeer .. 16 22 Rossini IO 2.2 Verdi 9 2.2 22 Donizetti 22 Auber .. 8 2.2 12 Bizet. 8 . . т 9.9 2.2 Flotow 7 . . 2 2.2 Gounod .. Bellini .. 7 2 Beethoven 1 Gluck .. 5 2.2 22 Nicolai .. 5 Frank 5 Boïeldieu 5 2 22 Brüll .. 4 99 Goldmark 4 Thomas ... 4 22 Spohr .. 2 Ι Halévy .. 2 . . Kreutzer.. .. T 22 22 Marschner 99

The highest number of performances was achieved (mirabile dictu!) by Nessler's "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen," which was given twenty-six times; next to it having been Wagner's "Die Walküre," produced fourteen times. The remaining works by Wagner, included in the Berlin réfertoire, were "Lohengrin" (10 performances), "Flying Dutchman" (6), "Tannhäuser" (5), "Rienzi" (3), "Die Meistersinger" (3), and "Tristan und Isolde" (once). Weber was represented by his three principal stage-works, "Freischütz" (7), "Oberon" (5), and "Euryanthe" (3), and by his resuscitated early work "Abu Hassan," which obtained four performances during the season. Although the advanced musical press of Berlin continually dwells upon the incapacity of the existing régime to render the Opera a representative national institution, the establishment in question, albeit subsidised by the crown, is bound to study a variety of tastes for its general support, and at any rate we in this country may well envy our neighbours the opportunities afforded them even under such circumstances.

A solemn performance in memory of the late Dr. Ferdinand Hiller was held last month at the Gürzenich Hall of Cologne, with which the name of the deceased musician has been for so many years associated. The proceedings included the production of the Funeral March from Hiller's Oratorio "Saul," and of Mozart's Requiem. Dr. Wüllner, the worthy successor of the late veteran Mäestro, conducted.

The third Musical Festival of the combined choirs of Schleswig and Holstein was announced to take place on the 28th and 29th ult, at Kiel.

At a Concert of sacred music, recently given at St. Mary's Church, Berlin, by the pupils of Herr Otto Dienel's Academy, two compositions by that gentleman-viz., a duet for soprano and tenor to words from the 135th Psalm, and an organ sonata (No. 2)-obtained a first hearing, and were very favourably received. The remainder of programme was of an interesting character, including numbers by Handel, Stadler, Bach, Rink, Mendelssohn, and Haydn.

A correspondent sends us a humorous account of the annual excursion of the pupils and professors of the Leipzig Conservatorium, which serves to illustrate the genial spirit in which the leading German music-school is conducted, and of which the following is an extract: "On Monday, June 8, the inhabitants of the quiet village of Ehrenberg were considerably excited by the arrival in their midst of a large and miscellaneous collection of human beings. The students of the Royal Conservatorium of Leipzig were enjoying their annual 'Ausflug.' At one o'clock precisely the company, consisting of several professors, the students and their friends, had assembled at the well-known gardens in the Rosenthal, whence they marched off bravely to the inspiring strains of a picked band of conservatorists. procession presented an imposing spectacle, nothing being visible amidst the trees but a moving mass of umbrellas and parasols. On their arrival at the Ehrenberg pleasure gardens, the weary and thirsty travellers were regaled with coffee and other light refreshments. . . . About six c'clock a pleasant excitement was created by the arrival of the highly respected director, Dr. Guenther, Dr. Carl Reinecke, and other leading functionaries connected with the Conservatorium. They were received at the entrance with an out-burst of music and applause. The company then adjourned to supper, at the conclusion of which several toasts were proposed and speeches made. All then repaired to the space allotted for dancing, the director and his lady leading the opening Polonaise, and the entertainment was kept up with much spirit until midnight, some returning to Leipzig by train, others, more romantically disposed, preferring the five mile walk through the dark woods. The fact must not be omitted that the students were indebted to the generosity of the directors for this most enjoyable 'Ausflug."

A grand Concert, devoted exclusively to works by Franz Liszt, was given at Strassburg, on the 3rd ult., under the direction of Herr Bruno Hilpert. The veteran pianistcomposer was present on the occasion, and expressed himself highly gratified by the performances.

It is rumoured in Paris musical circles that, like their predecessors, the present directors of the National Opéra find themselves unable to make both ends meet, in spite of retrenchments in working expenses, and notwithstanding the annual government grant of 900,000 francs. They demand, it is said, an increase of the subvention by at least 300,000 francs to avert the prospect of another collapse of the administration of the national institution, erected, it francs. Whether the French chambers will allow this further subsidy appears at least very doubtful. Yet, Paris without its Opéra would be a scarcely conceivable anomaly.

The leading Concert institutions of the French capital, on the other hand, have flourished during the past season, with the exception, perhaps, of that presided over by M. Benjamin Godard. For while the receipts realised by M. Lamoureux' twenty Château d'Eau Concerts amounted to 91,768 francs, and by the twenty-four performances of M. Colonne, at the Châtelet, to 150,768 francs, M. Godard, the successor of M. Pasdeloup, at the Populaires (now Concerts Modernes), only realised the sum of 70,037 francs with the maximum number of twenty-five performances. It is a significant fact that while the programmes of the two former institutions have been of an international character, with a liberal admixture of Wagnerian strains, the Concerts Modernes of M. Godard have confined themselves almost exclusively to the works of national French com-

An Italian work on Beethoven from the pen of Signor Leopoldo Mastrigli is about to be published at Rome.

The volume is dedicated to Franz Liszt.

We extract the following from our contemporary, the Daily Telegraph:-" Some of the continental papers erroneously announce the death of Signor Graziani, the distinguished baritone, so well known at the Royal Italian Opera. The deceased is his brother, Ludovico Graziani, who sang in London as a tenor nearly thirty years ago, and who has been for some time living in retirement. Ludovico Graziani was born at Fermo, in August, 1823."

The announcement of the death of Sir Julius Benedict was circulated in German papers some five or six weeks before that melancholy occurrence actually took place.

The death is announced, on May 24, at Munich, of Carl Bärmann, one of the most eminent clarinet virtuosos of the present century, aged seventy-four.

At Paris died, last month, at the age of fifty-six, Adolphe Blanc, the eminent violin-player, and a composer of merit.

MUSICAL DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I fully expected a reply to my letter on this subject; but I must take leave to maintain that your correspondent "Oxon., Cantab., and T.C.D.," although a graduate in three Universities (as his nom de plume states). has not answered my objections or complaints in anything like a satisfactory manner.

A few months ago, a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, assured me that Greek is a Compulsory Subject for Matriculation, although formerly the candidate was allowed to take any other language he chose in its place. It was upon his authority that I made my former statement about Homer; however, if I misunderstood my authority, I sit corrected.

To me the idea that musical degrees should not be intended primarily for the benefit of professional musicians, and for the security of the public who engage the services of these latter, is an absurdity and an injustice.

As to the amount of fees in Dublin, I am glad to see I was misinformed; my previous authority must answer for this too; he assured me his fees in toto amounted to nearly £100 (I mean, of course, for the two degrees).

I am well aware that, writing on my side of the subject, I lay myself open to the charge of wishing to drag my profession into the mire of ignorance, or at least to that of believing that the possession of a merely technical educa-tion by its members should be considered sufficient. But the charge would be untrue. What I think is that, as a professional musician does not go to a University to study his art, but to obtain an official recognition of the amount and nature of his professional qualifications, the present rule which compels him to matriculate like any school-boy is unjust, although I grant that he must be a well educated

But will your correspondent look at the instance of inwill be remembered, at a cost of over eighty millions of justice which I quoted with regard to the Royal University of Dublin-viz., that a man must waste six years of his life in obtaining his Doctor's degree?

Could not any University grant something like the following concession to the profession?

I. The candidate for a degree in music shall pass a fair examination in two languages besides his own (say, Latin and French), in the first two books of Euclid, and the elements of Algebra.

2. In a few days afterwards he shall pass the ordinary musical examination for the degree of Bachelor.

3. Six months afterwards he shall present himself for the degree of Doctor, and his examination shall be of the same kind as obtains in all our British Universities at present.

With reference to the first item, I venture to think the four subjects named are a fair test of a candidate's general education, and sufficient, too, without the addition of hydrostatics, Roman and Grecian History, &c.

There has long existed an earnest desire, both in the professional and public mind, for parliamentary legislation as a security to both teachers and pupils; and, should a law of the desired nature ever be passed, its principal provision must be some kind of compulsory degree or diploma for all professional teachers and performers. Let this be the usual degree of Bachelor or Doctor in Music, as stringent as ever in its musical requirements, but not quite so inaccessible to many men, as it now is, in regard to subjects which, say what you will, are certainly nothing but secondary items of a professional man's education.

Your correspondent speaks of various "diplomas" and "certificates" which are open to all candidates-L.R.A.M., F.C.O., and others. Now I would like to call attention to one little fact in connection with the former. The Royal Academy of Music grants a diploma of Licentiateship to candidates who shall satisfy the examiners in the following

I. In the Composition of the first movement of an original Symphony.

2. In the Composition of a Vocal fugue, with Orchestral accompaniment.

3. In the Composition of a Vocal solo, with or without orchestral accompaniment.

4. In the working of a paper on Harmony, all kinds of Counterpoint, Form, &c.

5. In a viva voce examination on most of these subjects. This is good, no doubt; and the L.R.A.M. would be well worth working for, but for a damper in the shape of the fact that the same degree is conferred upon mere players of any one standard instrument!

The thorough musician and the mere manipulator of one single instrument are thus placed upon exactly the same footing. I ask you, is this just? If not, then one at least of these certificates are worthless to both musicians and public, whatever they may be worth to incompetent men, who would give their ears for some letters after their name. Next to a University degree, undoubtedly must be placed the diploma of F.C.O.; yet this, being apparently concerned with one branch of the profession only, does not reach the music-cultivating public so effectually as it ought from its intrinsic worth.

I fear I have encroached too much upon your valuable space already; so, in conclusion, I will again express a hope that this subject will not be allowed to drop until proper and representative men shall have taken it in hand.

Yours very truly, Quæro Justitiam. June 9, 1885.

EDWARD HEESOM'S VIOLINS.

model), branded (just below the button) Thompson's, London, beautifully modelled and finished, handsomely marked wood (whole-back), the chestnut-hued varnish a treat to look at, while the tone is rich and powerful. This maker, like Heesom, flourished during the middle of last century, and the hand-books dismiss him with the bare mention of his name, which rather provokes me. Surely the furore over Italian masterpieces, though justifiable in itself, distracts the attention of amateurs from much really artistic work by our own countrymen.

LAY-VICARS AND THE CATHEDRAL ESTABLISH-MENTS COMMISSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I fully endorse all the remarks of your correspondent "A Lay-Vicar," in your June number, and I should like to add to them by saying that not only have Lay-Vicars a right to expect equal privileges with the clerical members of Cathedral Establishments in the matter of pension and superannuation, but that the salaries of the various Cathedral officials imperatively demand readjustment, and those of the Lay-Vicars a substantial increase.

No reasonable person can doubt that ninety-nine out of every hundred people who attend our Cathedral services are attracted thither, especially on week-days, wholely and solely by the music, and, to use the words of an eminent Cathedral Organist and Mus. Doc., "without the music our Cathedral services would not be tolerated for a single month.12 And yet the Recommendations of the Commissioners, from what I can gather, so far from seeking to improve the position of Lay-Clerks, tend rather in the other direction; and I trust that some united action will be taken to make their grievances known to Members of Parliament before the Bill comes before the House, with a view to making their position more assured, their salaries increased, and pensions secured to them by statute, as in the case of the clerical members of Cathedral Establishments .- I am, dear Sir, your obedient Servant,

ANOTHER LAY-VICAR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

*Notices of concerts, and other information subplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur. Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERGAVENNY.—Mr. Throne Biggs, Organist of the Parish Church, gave two Organ Recitals in St. Mary's Church, on Thursday, the 11th ult., in aid of the fund for Church expenses. The programmes were excellently rendered.

Sir,—Edward Heesom, the old English violin maker referred to by your correspondent, "A. M., Colchester," in your June issue, is simply mentioned in authoritative works on the violin as a maker who "copied Stainer," without any further comment, and I fear your correspondent has small chance of unearthing further particulars, though I should be glad were it otherwise, for I think there must be a few of our old English luthiers who have not received the attention they deserve, and that the list of those whose merits are recognised might well be added to. I have, for instance, an exquisitely-made fiddle (flat tenor, and the Rev. H. Deane, violoncello. The programme contained Schumann's Quintet in E flat, Sonata for Violoncello, by Boccherini, and Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. Mrs. Slade Baker presided at the pianoforte, and selected for her solo Chopin's two studies in C sharp minor. Miss Florence Clarke contributed songs by Haydn and Kücken.

BLACKPOOL.—The Afternoon Concerts at the Winter Gardens have been particularly attractive during the past month. Miss Bessie Holk, who is deservedly popular in Blackpool, has met with a cordial reception at each appearance, and her excellent rendering of several well known vocal pieces has been most thoroughly appreciated by numerous audiences. The band performances are also attractive items in the programme.

BRIGHTON.—The members of the Sacred Harmonic Society gave a Concert in celebration of the bi-centenary of Handel in the Dome, on Thursday evening, the 18th ult, the work selected being Joshua. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Norman, Madame Poole, Mr. Alfred Kenningham, and Mr. Henry Blower. Mr. Robert Taylor conducted, and Mr. J. Spearing presided at the organ. The accompaniments were well relayed by a small but effective orchestra, led by Mr. Baker. The work was admirably rendered throughout.

Baker. The work was admirably rendered throughout.

CATERHAN VALLEY—An Organ Recital was given in St. John's Church, on the 4th ult., by Mr. James Edward Street, from the works of the English, French, Italian, and German composers. The English school was represented by excerpts from Wesley, Sterndale Bennett, and Adams: the French, by Gounod and Léfébure Weyt, the Italian, by Pergolesi and Rossini; the German, by Haydn, Handel, Mendelssohn, Sporh, and Merkel. The organ, which has just been completed, comprises thirty-nine stops, distributed among three manuals and pedal. The tone is very fine, and does justice to Measrs.
Walker and Sons, the builders.

CHELMSORD.—The annual Festival of the Chelmsford Association of Choirs took place on the 22th ult, at the Parish Church. The voices numbered about 38o. The singing was bright and energetic, and the service well rendered under the conductorship of Mr. R. Lemaire, of Erith, the choirmaster. Mr. Frye, F. Co., the Organist, presided at the organ, and played an admirable selection before and after the service. There was a very large congregation.

atter the service. Incre was a very large congregation.

Chepstow Castle, on Wednesday, the 17th ult. The Battalion Band of the 1st Mon. R.V.C., under Bandmaster Hazell, played selections of instrumental music, and glees by Macfarren, Pinsuti, &c., were sung by the Choral Society. The See-Saw Waltz was sung by children, Mr. A. E. Kingsford conducted, and the accompaniments were played by Misses Watkins and Thomas. Over 1,200 persons were admitted to the Castle during the afternoon and evening.

DARLINGTON.—On Sunday afternoon, the 21st ult., at North Road Chapel, the choir, assisted by friends, under the leadership of their Organist, Mr. J. W. Lockey, gave a performance of a Cantata entitle Ruth, composed by Reid. Mr. C. Stephenson presided at the organ, and played with much effect Andante Grazioso (Smart), Andantino in G (Merkel), and "Marche aux Flambeaux" (Clark).

(Merkel), and "Marche aux Flambeaux" (Clark).

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. Hebry Baillie, Organist and Choirmaster of All Souls' Church, gave his first Organ Recital of the present season, in the above church, on the 10th Ut. The programme included Mendelssohn's first Organ Sonata, and selections from the works of Silas, Beethoven, Hopkins, Wely, and Costa.——Mendelssohn's Elijah was given at the Devonshire Park Pavilion, on the 10th ult., by the members of the Musical Society, under the conductorship of Dr. W. H. Sangster, Organist of St. Saviour's Church. The solos were excellently sung by Miss Bertha Moore, Miss Alice Grey, Miss, J. Easter, Bertham L. Sangster, Organist of St. Saviour's Church. The choruses were well-endered throughout.

EDINBURGH.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. John Newsome in the Grange Parish Church, on Thursday, May 28. The programme was well selected and admirably rendered. The vocalists were Mrs. Ellis, Miss Anderson, Miss Andrews, and Messrs. Rae and Sinclair.

ELGIN.—Mr. Collyer gave an Organ Recital (the third of a series) in the South Free Church, on Monday afternoon, May 25. The programme was excellently rendered and thoroughly appreciated.

FARINGON—The Choral Society gave a most successful Concert on May 25, under the conductorship of Mr. G. W. Habgood. The artists were Madame Adeline Paget, Madame Raymond, and Mr. Horscroft, all of whom were highly appreciated. The programme inincluded Van Bree's St. Cecitia's Day, a humorous Cantata, The Ghost, by Behrend, and some miscellaneous items.

by Behrend, and some miscellaneous items.

Gosport. — The Choral Society gave a Concert, on May 25, at the Star Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience. The first part consisted of Spohr's "Grd, Thou art Great," the solos being admirably sung by Madame Adelina Paget. The second part was miscellaneous. "Comforty e" and "Every valley" were well rendered by Mr. John Probert; and "Let the bright Scraphim" displayed Madame Psketl's voice to advantages. Mr. Harvey Finchet, who has worked will energy and scal to bring the Society to its present state of efficiency, is deserving of the greatest credit.

GREENOCK.—Mr. D. Middleton (Organist of the Mid Parish Church), assisted by his pupils, gave a Recital in the Watt Institute Hall, on the ryth ult. The programme, which was selected to test the powers of the performers, was well rendered.

GUELPH.—The members of the Choral Union, assisted by the Mendelsohn Quintette Club of Boston, gave the second Concert of the season, in the City Hall, on Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from The Messiah, and the second part was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists were Madame Cora Giese, Miss Stevenson, Mrs. Elmslie, Miss Fielding, and Mr. A. Yule; solo violin, Mr. Fritz Gese, Miss Stevenson, Wrs. Elmslie, Miss Fielding, and Mr. A. Stevenson, Mrs. Stevenson, Mrs. Elmslie, Miss Fielding, and Mr. A. Yule; solo violin, Mr. Fritz Gese, Miss Stevenson, Mrs. Elmslie, Miss Fielding, and Mr. W. Philp conducted.

Herne Bay.—An excellent Concert was given at the Pavilion on Tuesday evening, May 26, in aid of the Herne Church Fund. Miss Carrington, a promising young soprano, was highly successful in Gounod's "Ave Maria" and Tours's "Gete of Heaven," the violin obbligate to the "Ave Maria" being played with artistic finish by the Rev. C. W. Howis. The pianists were the Misses Colin and Weguelin, Songs, &c., were also contributed by Messra, Fricker (Canterbury Cathedral), Scott, Lethbridge, Von Audlan, the Rev. C. W. Howis, and the Rev. J. R. Buchanan. Mrs. Grey and Miss Annie Brown were the accompanists.

Huddenspireldo.—The new organ in Milton Church was formally opened, on the 23rd ult, with a Recital by Mr. J. H. Pearson, Organist of Brighouse Parish Church. A large congregation was present, and the tone of the organ was much admired. The instrument has been built by Messrs, James Conacher and Sons, of Huddersfield, on what is known as the electro-peumatic principle, and is the first complete organ in this country to which the system has been applied.

organ in this country to which the system has been applied.

LAUNCESTON, CORNWALL—The 14th Annual Festival Service of the Launceston District Association of Church Choirs was held in the Parish Church, on Wednesday, the 17th ult. There werefitten choirs present, numbering 300 voices. The music was hymns 430, 308, 59, 18, and 308, from Hymns Ancient and Modern; Pasims 15, 21, 110, and 150; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Chants from Pasilter, Ancient and Modern; Anthem "The Lord is my Shepherd," by James Shaw, and the Te Deum to a Gregorian setting. The whole of the music was most efficiently rendered, and the Anthem admirably sung.
The chanting was also a model of steadiness and precision in pointing, and the greatest pains must have been taken in training to produce such excellent results. Mr. Dalby, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, and Choirmaster to the Association, presided at the organ, and was warmly congratulated at the close of the service.

LERDS.—The programme of Dr. Spark's Organ Recital in the Town Hall, on the 13th ult, included the "Marche Funèbre," from the Legend of St. Cecilia, and a selection from the oratorio St. Peter, as a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Sir Julius Benedict.

Legend of St. Cicilia, and a selection from the oratorio St. Peter, as a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Sir Julius Benedict.

Liverol.—An admirable performance of Dr. J. F. Bridge's Oratorio Mount Moriah and Mendelischn's Hear my Prayer was created by the Catherian of St. Peter, on Thursday evening, the Catherian of St. Peter, on Thursday evening, the critical state of the St. Peter, on Thursday evening, the critical state of the Catherian Organist, Mr. F. H. Burstall, have been instituted in this city. Admission was by ticket only, and long before the time appointed for the commencement of the service the Catherial Church was crowded. Of the music of Mount Morah, as it was the first prominent performance of the work in this city, it is only right to say that it created a profound impression, combining, as it does, dramatic effect with a pure and devout style. Special mention must be made of the melodious, though strict, canon, "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter," the beautiful eight-part choral, the chorus" To the Godly there ariseth up light in the darkness," and the final chorus with its concluding fugue "Thy righteousness standeth like the strong mountains." The performance was admirable. The treble solo and recitatives were well sung by Master F. Mullineux, for the tenor by Mr. Dakin (who deserves special praise for his rendering of the very difficult recitative and solo), and for the basses, by Mr. Burt and Mr. Shimmin. The choruses were sung by members of the Cathedral Proper the tool was aung by Master F. Mullineux, and the performance of the whole motett was almost faultess. Mr. F. H. Burstall Proper the tool was aung by Master D. Mullineux, and the performance of the whole motett was almost faultess. Mr. F. H. Burstall as played by Dr. Bridge, the important harp part being well rendered by Mr. Harrold Jarvis. Before the Oratorio three was a short service, the prayers being intoned by the Reverend J. H. Becke, the Precentor, the proper season of the success of the performance, it is i LLANELLY.—Mr. Arthur W. Swindell, Organist of All Saints' Church, gave his annual Organ Recital, on Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., before a large congregation. A well selected programme was excellently rendered and thoroughly appreciated. The solo vocalists were Miss A. L. Jones, Miss A. James, and Mr. Pritchard. Several choruses were effectively sung by the choir of the church.

MANCHESTER.—The Sacred Harmonic Society gave a very interesting Service of Sacred Song, on Sunday evening, the 14th ult., in the Lower Moss Lane Mission Hall. The solos were sung by Miss Nield, a rising young soprano, Mrs. Newton, Mr. C. Birkhead, and Mr. Herbert Owles. Mr. Stokes conducted, and Mr. Cunlific played the organ accompaniements in conjunction with the band. The hall was crowded. The Society proposes next season to give a performance every other Sunday, in churches and chapels in Manchester, the orchestral arrangements being undertaken by Mr. George Jackson.

ments being undertaken by Mr. Leorge Jakzew as given in the Town Hall, on the 13th ult., by the pupils of the Loretto School. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Judas Maccabeus, Elijah, and the "Hallelujah" chorus from The Messiah, and the beacon part was miscellaneous. All the music was well rendered, but the atoging of the Handelian choruses: was surprisingly good, reflecting great credit upon the energetic and talented Conductor, Mr. Potter.

NewASTLE.—Miss Hildegard Werner and her pupils gave a wellarranged and highly successful Concert, in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, on the 2nd ult. The special feature of the evening was the pianoforte playing of Miss M. Keiffenheim, who also gave some violin solos with good effect. Miss R. Cherini was very successful in her songs, and Miss Werner was an efficient accompanish.

ARCOMPARISH.

RATHFARNHAM, DUBLIN.—The new organ, presented by Mr. J. D. Tottenham, and built by Messrs. Foster and Andrews, Hull, was noened on Sunday, the 7th uit., by Mr. W. A. Collisson, Mus Bac., who gave as voluntaries, Concerto in G. No. z. (Handel); "God save the King" and Moderato in F. Rinkl. The Old Hundredth was sung as a processional, and the Psalms were chanted to the 8th Ecclesiastical Tone. The Anthems were "O praise God" (Weldon); "Rejoice" (Purcell); and "I have surely built" (Boychurch Cathedas), and Mr. Heary Beaumont (Carl Rosa Opera Charles). The chair numbered forty-five voices. The church was crowded.

RUGBY.—On Tuesday evening, the 16th ult., the Rugby Amateur Choral Society, under the directorship of Miss Emily Lawrence, gave a private Concert in the Town Hall, when there was a fashionable attendance, and an excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music was brilliantly executed. Miss Lawrence's new song, "At Last," was finely rendered by Mr. Dernis Harte, and encored. The violonical models of the state of the control of the state of Funeral March, played by her in memory of Sir Julius Benedict.

SALISBURY—The Festival of the Diocesan Choral Association was held on the 4th ult, when, in addition to the Cathedral choir, there were present choirs from Dorchester, Gillingham, and elsewhere, numbering in all some 300 voices. There was also a full orchestra, partly drawn from St. Paul's Cathedral, and under the able conductor-haip of Dr. Martin. Mr. South presided most efficiently at the organ. The service was Gadsby in C, the responses being sung to Tallius esting, the chants for the special Paulms—cxxii. and cxxv.—being taken from the Cathedral Pashter. The service was intoned by the Rev. W. H. Carpenter, one of the Minor Canons. After the third collect Mendelssonn's Hymn of Praiss was given. The opening symphony was played with great precision. In parts the brass instruments were somewhat too emphatic for the strings, and it was surely by some mistake that these were all arranged together on one side of the nave and the wind instruments opposite them on the other. In the Cathedral choir; and the soprano solo and choruses were also well sung. The performance altogether was a marked success, and the organisation reflects no little credit on the Rev. Mytes Barnes, the energetic Secretary of the Association. The Cathedral was thronged with an attentive congregation. with an attentive congregation.

SOUTHWELL—The Nottinghamshire Church Choral Union held its wenty-eighth annual Festival in the Cathedral on Thursday the 18th ult. There are sixty-two parish choirs enrolled in the Union, of which the Bishop of Southwell is patron, and on this occasion the chorus numbered 500 voices. The Morning Service consisted of Processional Phymn "Hark, hark my 500," music by Rev. R. F. Smith, exaction of the Southwell is patron, and on this occasion the chorus numbered 500 voices. The Morning Service consisted of Processional Phymn "Hark, hark my 500," music by Rev. R. F. Smith, efficiently an expensional phymn "Hark, hark my 500," music by Rev. R. F. Smith, efficiently and the state of the cathedral choir singing the bass solo which runs through the anthem, all the other voices singing an accompaniment. Mr. Marriott, the Organist, played as a voluntary a March by Sir Geo. Elvey. The Evening Service was attended by a vast congregation and a sermon was preached by Canon Twells, of Peterborough Cathedral. The Evening Service was Goss in A, and the Anthem "Praise the Lord" (Hayes), the verse being beautifully sung by the cathedral choir. The Rev. R. F. Smith intoned the Service. The Rev. W. J. Cruft, Vicar of Edwalton, who is Choirmaster of the Union, conducted with his usual ability.

THORNYON HEATH.—The eleventh season of the Musical Society terminated on Thursday, May 28, when a most successful Concert was given in the Public Hall. The first part consisted of a selection from The Messiak (in commemoration of the bicentenary of Handel's birth), Macsme Wilson-Osman, Miss Madge Christo, and Mr. Huibert Fulerson singing the solos with much effect, and the choruses throughout being exceedingly well rendered. Sir George Macfarren's Cantata May Day formed the principal feature in the second part, the soprano solos being sung by Madame Wilson-Osman, who received an encore for the song with burden, "Beautiful May." Mr. Kiner gave a pianoforte solo, and Miss Christo and Mr. Fulkerson contributed songs, all of which were well received, Miss Christo singing, in response to an encore, a manuscript song, composed by the Conductor, entitled "There's not a wild flower blossoning." Mrs. Sauncers presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Ernest Kiner conducted with his usual ability. TYNENGUYH.—The members of the Philharmonic Society zave. THE LONDON CHANT BOOK

HARVEY LÖHR & HOWARD B. HUMPHERY.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS NET. PRICE TO SUBSCRIBERS, THREE SHILLINGS.

This Chant Book is constructed upon principles that do not appear to have hitherto guided compilers of works of a similar character. It contains nearly 600 Chants (single and double) by Ancient and Modern Composers, many of which are now printed for the first time. Two distinct sets are arranged for the Daily and Proper Psalms, and also for the Psalms in the Special Services in the Prayer Book (Holy Matrimony, &c.) The alternative arrangement will prove of great service to Organists, Precentors, and others, to whom the first setting does not commend itself. One important feature of the work is that no chant is repeated under any circumstances, the whole number being entirely different. Another feature is that many chants composed specially for certain Psalms are appropriated to those Psalms. A large selection of Additional Chants is included over and above those set to the Psalms, and these are recommended to be used to the various Canticles in Churches where a full Cathedral Service is not in vogue.

The greatest care has been exercised on the part of the Editors to ensure a correct version of each chant. Most, if not all, of the old favourites are included-Chants without which no book would be complete; and the Editors believe that this work will form one of the largest, most complete and valuable collections ever published.

before JULY 31 next, in order that a sufficiently large number of copies may be printed to supply the demand. P.O.O. to be made payable at Vere Street, W.

SHORT SETTINGS

GEORGE C. MARTIN. Price One Shilling each.

Church-music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir, and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral societies are almost universal. This want is specially felt with regard to music for the Office of Holy Communion, and it is hoped that these services will be found well within the capabilities of an ordinary choir, yet not wanting in an effort to give due expression to the solemnity of the words.

BIBLE MUSIC OF THE

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.

"The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has he accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Missical Times.

Mr. LAMBRAN, and the EGROT, Mr. A. H. BROWN. The Author Only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keynotes of all."—IWestern Morning News.
"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times.

parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tunefly, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. 1 and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man pf many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4), a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes' (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure six-four, a time borrowed by the Church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern choirs."—Musical Standard.
"We would specially draw attention to the upusually good. compose.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune '5t. Angelus,' No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of two hundred and fifty years ago."—Church Herald.

NEW WORK.

A RRANGEMENTS for the ORGAN. By W. J. A KKANGEMENTS for the OKCARN. Dy W. J.

WESTROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect. Nos. 1 to 12 now ready.

THE HOLY CITY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."-Queen oser into a piace of usinction amongst matter musicians. — when "A good sound musical work is this "Holy City." I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and demonour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul. "—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantat-must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birming-ham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times,

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."-Mancheste

THE MONTHS

ALFRED R. GAUL.

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

(Composer of the "Holy City," "Ruth," &c.)

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are own special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The planoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary planist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

DOMINION COMPANY, ORGAN

BOWMANVILLE, ONTARIO, CANADA.

BROTHERS, SOLE AGENTS FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM. FORSYTH

ACTION-

Inventors of the Double Valve Action, both valves opening with only one pitman; originators of the manner of opening Back Valve by means of Lever. By this invention our larger Organs have the advantage over any other makers, using Exhaust Bellows, as by the free and proper distribution of the Vibrators we are enabled to produce quick speech from the largest to the smallest reed, with either light or strong blowing of Bellows. Our Mr. G. Piggott originated this action in the year 1873, and the same has been perfected and used by us for the last ten years.

SCRIBNER TUBES-

Only by the above system of action can the Scribner Tubes be used with full effect, as the register in connection with the Tubes opens into the back valve, thereby adding greatly to the power and brilliancy of the Tube Register or set of Reeds. The invention known as Scribner Tubes we have used for the last ten years, neither time nor expense having been spared in improving and perfecting the same, and only in our various Combination Styles can the best effect of this invention be found.

TWO-MANUAL ORGANS-

Our various styles of Two-Manual and Pedal Organs are simple in construction, and the coupler movements are not liable to get out of order. We particularly call attention to the arrangement of the Vibrators or Reeds, also to the Pedal and Manual Coupler arrangements, of which we are the original inventors.

BELLOWS

Style 93.

Our system of Bellows will withstand all climatic changes, as by our method of construction all risks of cracking and splitting are avoided, all the wooden parts being pinned and pannelled, leaving an opening of about one-eighth of an inch between panel and frame work, which is covered with strong rubber drill.

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of

LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

TESTIMONIALS.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O., English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability. GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Son. In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. Challen & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if not mailed.

THE "BELL" ORGANS.

THE high standard of excellence maintained throughout all Organs manufactured by us, from the largest to the smallest, has created a world-wide demand for our Goods.

We will ask dealers not to compare our prices with those of any other Maker without taking into consideration the superior quality of our Organs; and if they do this they will find the BELL ORGAN not only the BEST IN QUALITY but the BEST VALUE IN THE MARKET.

Dealers save Wholesalers' profits in buying direct from us.

We make special Organs for expert, and supply Catalogues in all languages, and as we always carry a stock of at least 400 Organs we can fill all orders immediately.

PROSPECTUS.

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in The Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended. The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to throw light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Hence the series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by them-the series had for hest title "The Great Composers, sketched by themselves."

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notice were received, it was determined to extend their acope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "aketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make additions in the case of the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices separately as "Primers of Musical Biography." In the interior of "Novelos" primers of Musical Biography is to convex, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of its its. Exposurable of the mission of the principal events of its its. Exposurable of the principal events of the its its. Exposurable of the principal events of the its its. Exposurable of the principal events of the its its to whom they are decided. They are the best material upon which to base an estimate of character,

CAUTION .- Ainsworth's Patent Organ Pedal Attachments are the only ones which should be used, as they are positively the only ones which do not in the least deteriorate the Tone or Action of Piano-

Ainsworth's Organ Pedals and Patent Actions are used by Organists and Organ Students in almost every town and village in England, and are much used in Scotland. They are moderately used in Ireland and Wales, and are being exported continually to every part of the globe. The Organ Pedals and Patent Actions are made by the most improved steam machinery and specially made tools, which guarantee great accuracy in working without having recourse to complicated fittings. A careful examination of Ainsworth's Lists (with reference numbers and explanation) will, we doubt not, clearly prove to any one the true "Perfection" of his inventions.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

"Mr. Ainsworth (Fellow of the Society of Science) has most ingeniously arranged his Organ Pedal Attachments for Pianofortes, so as to allow their being locked (when not in use) by simply drawing out a stop. The Organ Pedals can also be removed and replaced at will. The most valuable arrange-ment, however, is that of perfect freedom, there not being even a possible chance of sticking or getting out of order."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

AUGUST 1, 1885.

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON

By HENRY C. LUNN.

Since the commencement of our records of the London Musical Season in 1863, Italian Opera has always claimed our first attention, not by right of its intrinsic attraction, but by the necessity of acknowledging that with the rich patrons of music it stood as the foremost institution of the country. That it had but slight effect upon the progress of real art was perfectly known to all who watched the steady growth of music adapted to the tastes and circumstances of the people outside this exclusive aristocratic circle; but up to the present year the change in public feeling has not been sufficiently pronounced to justify us in casting aside the custom we have so long followed, and bringing to the front a lyrical establishment the abstract excellence of which, apart from its nationality, has enabled it to compete so successfully with its foreign rival as to compel it either to retire from the field-a result at first seriously contemplated-or to give a late and brief season, supported by the efforts of a single prima donna. Commencing its performances at a time when the usual Italian Opera prospectuses were formerly anxiously looked for, the Carl Rosa company at once secured large audiences to listen to works sung in the language of the country, and placed upon the stage with a degree of completeness in every department which could not but satisfy all who came to hear the music, rather than to pet the vocalists. The speedy production of Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda" and Massenet's "Manon" proved that the management had no intention of relying entirely upon operas already well known; and the unexampled success of the season sufficiently evidenced that Mr. Carl Rosa has not only "supplied a want," but supplied it so well as materially to increase the demand. The merits of the two operas mentioned have been sufficiently discussed in our columns, and it remains only to say that the works selected during the season from the repertoire of the establishment have been generally well cast, and produced with the minutest attention to scenic effect. The principal artists, Madame Marie Roze, Madame Valleria, Madame Julia Gaylord, Madame Georgina Burns, Miss Josephine Yorke, Messrs. Joseph Maas, Barton McGuckin, Ludwig, Leslie Crotty, Snazelle, and indeed all the members of the company, have proved themselves, during an arduous season, thoroughly reliable and accomplished vocalists; and next year, when a new opera by Mr. Mackenzie will be produced, there can be little doubt that Mr. Rosa's undertaking will obtain even a still firmer hold of the London public. A good word must be said for the excellent conductorship of Mr. Randegger and Mr. Goossens, whose indefatigable exertions have materially contributed to the success of the season.

After it had been positively—and, as everybody thought, authoritatively—announced that London would this year be without its fashionable temple of lyrical art, Mr. Mapleson opened Covent Garden Theatre for a limited number of representations of Italian Opera, Madame Adelina Patti being advertised to sing at every performance. On extra nights, however, an excellent vocalist, Mdlle. Alma Fohström, has appeared; but the main attraction has been Madame Patti, who, with the exception of a highly successful first appearance as the heroine in "Carmen," has kept to the well-worn Operas, and been rewarded for her fine singing by applause and bouquets, according to the time-honoured custom at this establishment. It has been said (we know not with what truth) that Italian Opera, under high patronage, with Mr. Ernest Gye as Director, will be revived next year; and even that special nights, on which the Prince and Princess of Wales will attend, are to be set apart, when none but subscribers will be admitted. Into the merits and demerits of such a scheme we do not now propose to enter; but there can be little doubt that, as reliance upon the public to support the overwhelming expenses of such an establishment has been proved to be fallacious, some powerful aristocratic aid must be forthcoming, ornow that the taste of real music-lovers has been led in another direction—Italian Opera may very probably come to be regarded (as English Opera used to be) somewhat in the light of an unimportant disturbing influence in the legitimate attractions of the musical season.

It must be mentioned that an attempt was made by Herr Franke to bring over a company for the performance of German Opera, an appeal being publicly circulated for a guarantee fund to assist in defraying the expenses; but the response was scarcely sufficiently energetic to warrant the carrying out of the undertaking, and it was therefore abandoned. With reference to the proposition, we may however say that even the most ardent admirers of Wagner could hardly have been satisfied with a brief season devoted to one opera, six representations of "Tristan und Isolde" being all that was promised to the subscribers.

In the grandiloquent address of Mr. Samuel Hayes, who, with an inferior company, chorus, and orchestra, opened Her Majesty's Theatre for the performance of Italian Opera, and closed it after two or three representations, we were told that the works would be placed on the stage "in the completest manner possible." If he had added "with the resources at his command" we might have known what to expect; but the public must surely be capable of judging of the truth of this assurance; and the small amount of patronage bestowed upon his enterprise will, we trust, have sufficiently convinced him of this fact to prevent his again venturing upon an experiment which really throws discredit on the cause.

The Philharmonic Society, by commissioning the Bohemian composer, Antonín Dvorák, to write and conduct a Symphony at one of its concerts, has partially condoned for its almost entire non-recognition of the compositions of native artists. The triumphant success of this new work will render the past season one of the most memorable in the history of an association which in its early days not only drew public attention to those high-class musical creations existing around us, but liberally invited composers to contribute new ones, which, produced and stamped with approval by a nation then branded "unmusical," have now taken their place amongst the classics of the world. Sincerely do we counsel the directors of this Society to persevere in this course of action, for they may rest assured that the eighty-eight compositions sent from all parts of the world may be accepted as fair specimens of the effect of a free competition, even were the sum offered double that which resulted in the performance of the ambitious "Dramatic Overture," by Gustav Ernest, which gained the prize. It remains only to congratulate the Society upon the engagement of Sir Arthur Suliivan as Conductor for the season, the delicacy and precision of the orchestra under his direction having very materially aided the attraction of the Concerts.

The Richter Concerts have this season been thoroughly successful—certainly artistically, and, we have every reason to believe, financially. Wagner and many other of the modern German composers have been well represented; but there has been a satisfactory variety in the selections, even a Symphony of Haydn's having had a place in one of the programmes. The orchestral works have been rendered with a perfection to which Herr Richter has now accustomed his audiences—Beethoven's Choral Symphony more especially; and, on the whole, the vocal music has been extremely good. An autumn series of Concerts is announced to take place in October and November next, and the usual summer series of nine Concerts will commence in May, 1886.

series of nine Concerts will commence in May, 1886.
The Sacred Harmonic Society gave a proof of the desire of the Directors to recognise the claims of English composers by producing Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" (which had previously been heard only at the Norwich Festival) at the first Concert. Berlioz's "L'Enfance de Christ" and Handel's "Belshazzar" were welcome revivals during the season; but the good effect of the engagement of Mr. W. H. Cummings to direct the rehearsals of the choir was greatly marred by the placing of Mr. Charles Hallé at the conductor's desk for the Concerts. Either of these excellent artists would undoubtedly have produced highly satisfactory results had only one been responsible for the performance; and we are therefore gratified to find that Mr. Cummings has been appointed sole Conductor for next season. Not only for the sake of the reputation of the Society, but in justice to the members of a really able choir, this is a wise resolution, and the Directors are to be warmly commended for their prompt action in the matter.

First in importance, as celebrating the bi-centenary of Handel's birth, must be placed the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, which was appropriately given this year instead of next, when it would have occurred in triennial succession. The decisive success of the whole of these performances is the best proof that can possibly be given of the imperishable nature of the works of a composer who has for so many years reigned in the hearts of the English nation. attendances were enormous, and the whole of the compositions-under the steady and intelligent conductorship of Mr. August Manns, who has indeed most worthily succeeded Sir Michael Costa as director of this Festival-were rendered with a precision and effect reflecting the highest credit upon all concerned. In connection with the above-named event, a special musical service took place at Westminster Abbey, under the direction of Dr. Bridge, the collection being in aid of the Royal Society of Musicians, when Madame Albani kindly gave her services, and a selection from Handel's works, including the Det-tingen Te Deum, was given. The recently formed tingen Te Deum, was given. The recently formed Handel Society, too, revived the almost forgotten oratorio "Saul" during the season, and numerous other compositions by the great master were performed in various parts of London. As the present year is also the bi-centenary of the birth of Bach, various performances of his works took place during the season; and advantage was taken of this circumstance by the Bach Choir, under Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, to give the Mass in B minor at the Albert Hall, the care with which it had been prepared for the occasion being amply evidenced throughout one of the finest renderings of this great work ever given. A Concert of the Bach Choir also took place during the season at St. James's Hall, when Mr. Hubert Parry's music to scenes from Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound" (first produced at the Gloucester Festival of 1880) was performed. We may here express our regret that Mr. Goldschmidt has resigned the conductorship of this Society, not only because it really owes its existence to his efforts, but in recollection of his praiseworthy exertions in maintaining the high character upon which the Association was originally based. As Dr. Villiers Stanford has succeeded to the office of Conductor, we may reasonably anticipate that the Society will thoroughly sustain its present state of efficiency, and continue the good work for which it was formed.

The season of the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts, despite the engagement of several of the most eminent performers, has been somewhat disappointing, in consequence of the constant succession of well-known pieces, and the non-appearance of some artists who are annually looked for. Of course, the absence of Madame Schumann was unavoidable; but other pianists might have been heard; and variety in style lends much freshness to Concerts which, from their nature, have a tendency to become monotonous. English music, too, seems to have been strangely neglected, for Mr. Mackenzie's clever Pianoforte Quartet in E flat stood alone during the season as the representative of native talent. marvellous double-bass playing of Signor Bottesini was a most attractive item in the programmes, and will long dwell in the memory of those who heard him; for, unlike most virtuosi, his performance appeals with equal force to the trained musician as to the mere admirer of his wondrous powers.

The Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace have been of average interest, the production of Berlioz's "Te Deum" being the principal event of the season. Raff's "Winter Symphony," Mr. Cowen's "Welsh Symphony," and Brahms's No. 3, in F, have, however, been welcome items in the programmes; and the performance of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" proved that Mr. Manns is perfectly ready to give a place to English composers when a work of exceptional merit from their pen is ready to his hand.

The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. Barnby, by the production of Wagner's "Parsifal" considerably advanced its reputation as a trained body of executants, the failure of the work with the audience being solely due to the fact of the music being disunited with that dramatic action which is absolutely essential to its effect. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" received scant justice, as was recorded in our columns at the time of its performance; but many other well-known compositions, including Gounod's "Redemption" and Berlioz's "Faust," were finely rendered, and attracted large audiences.

True to his promise, Mr. Henry Leslie placed himself once more at the head of his world-renowned choir, and gave two Concerts during the season, reviving many of those pleasant recollections with which his name has been for so many years associated. The part-singing was excellent throughout; and we are glad to find that the result of the performances has been sufficiently encouraging to justify the Director in announcing a continuance of the Concerts next year.

The London Musical Society has fully maintained its character for the production of works unknown to London audiences; for although only two Concerts have been given during the season, at the second of which there was no band, a selection from Dvorák's Orchestral "Legenden," Schumann's Cantata "Der Sängers Fluch," Rheinberger's legend "Christoforus," and excerpts from the "Pour Passions," by Heinrich Schütz, have been included in the programmes. Under the conductorship of Mr. Barnby, the choir rendered all these pieces with commendable precision, and the Concerts were in the highest degree interesting.

In spite of the unprecedented success of Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," at the last Norwich Festival (for which it was expressly written), the many subtle beauties which it contains had, from certain fortuitous circumstances, never been clearly revealed, not only in the choral portions, but in the principal soprano part, until the performance which took place in March at St. James's Hall, when the services of Madame Albani were secured, in addition to those of Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley (who sang in the work on its production at Norwich), an excellent orchestra and choir were engaged, and the composer came from Italy to conduct, having also presided over several of the rehearsals. The new life infused into the highly dramatic music assigned to the soprano, the exceptionally fine singing of the choir (which had been carefully trained by Mr. Eaton Faning), and the delicate playing of the band (under the leadership of Mr. Carrodus) in the important orchestral details, combined to render this one of the most memorable performances of the season, and materially enhanced the already high appreciation both of the work and its composer.

It must also be recorded that Mr. Geaussent gave a Concert in connection with his choir, the programme of which included Mackenzie's fine Cantata, "Jason," and a new Patriotic Hymn by Dvorák. This, indeed, would have been a performance of exceptional interest, for Madame Albani, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley were engaged as principal vocalists, and Dvorák's work, heard for the first time in London, was conducted by the composer. Unfortunately, however, the result was anything but satisfactory; and the event need only be here alluded to in proof of the fallacy of supposing that good works and good singers, without a skilled and thoroughly experienced Conductor, both at the rehearsals and the performance, can ever achieve success. Of course, in the case of Dvorák's Hymn, everything was done that could be done with the untrained forces at command; but it was impossible to struggle with so many disadvantages, and we can only look forward to again hearing this remarkably original work under more favourable circumstances.

Although music was made a prominent feature in the prospectus of the Inventions Exhibition, we fail to see any important results to the art which have accrued from it. Certainly there was a very fair, though scarcely, perhaps, a thoroughly representative, collection of musical instruments; and open-air instrumental concerts-materially aided in attraction by the electric light-drew large audiences. Musical performances and "Historic Concerts" have also taken place in the Albert Hall; and, at an enormous expense, foreign bands have been imported-notably the Strauss orchestra, for the execution of dance music-but, although curiosity to hear these overpraised artists may have greatly added to the profits of the Exhibition, assuredly neither of the advertised objects of the undertaking-" No. 1, Inventions; No. 2, Music"-can have been in the slightest degree benefited by this excessive outlay.

The opening of the Albert Palace, at Battersea Park, must be mentioned as one of the events of the season, a Concert, including a "Dedication Ode," composed for the occasion by the Conductor, Mr. Caldicott, being given, with a very fair orchestra. Recitals on a fine organ and Concerts have taken place daily before large and appreciative audiences. As a "Gilbert and Sullivan" Opera is annually

As a "Gilbert and character of the color of the color of the color of the call; and in no respect can it be said that they have failed to sustain their reputation. The "Mikado" is neither better nor worse than its many predecessors; but it becomes a question had been given. The music classes had succeeded whether a reproduction of the same type of characters can be considered a novelty, and whether, therefore, the mere fact of the authors "sustaining their reputation" will much longer satisfy the public. Both librettist and composer have exceptional powers which they are still content to adapt to popular taste. Some day they may enter the region of pure art, and challenge a higher standard of judgment than they have yet done. Meantime it is no kindness to conceal the fact that their work begins to show signs of wear, and that the reminiscences of their former productions cannot be much longer effectually concealed, even under the disguise of a Japanese costume.

The Concerts of the various Musical Societies of the metropolis have been of much interest, the Borough of Hackney Choral Association (Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout) performing Dvorák's "Stabat Mater"; the Highbury Philhammonic Society (Conductor, Dr. Bridge) Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero ductor, Dr. Brigge Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Cantata "Hero and Leander"; the Tufnell Park Choral Society (Conductor, Mr. W. H. Thomas), and Bow and Bromley Institute (Conductor, Mr. W. G. McNaught) Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon"; and excellent programmes having been provided by the Kyrle Choir (Conductor, Mr. Malcolm Lawson), the Hampstead Choral Society (Conductor, Mr. Willem Coenen), and mean others which want of snace only compels and many others, which want of space only compels us to pass over. The Royal Academy of Music, Royal College of Music, Guildhall School of Music, the Royal Normal College for the Blind, and several other educational institutions have also displayed the good effects of their tuition by occasional public performances; and amongst the numerous Orchestral and Chamber Concerts may be mentioned those of Señor Sarasate, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mr. Walter Bache, Mr. Cusins, Mdlle. Kleeberg, Herr Franz Rummel, Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Ludwig, Messrs. Walter Mackway and C. S. Macpherson, and Herr Oscar Beringer, all of which have been well attended and highly successful.

As we predicted, portions of Gounod's sacred Trilogy "The Redemption" have been constantly given as service music at the various churches in London; and we are glad to perceive that the movement for the introduction of orchestral accompaniments to religious works in places of worship is rapidly gaining ground. Most of the clergy are extremely earnest in their efforts to promote this desirable innovation upon old-world notions; and musicians must regard with much gratification the fact of such a reform so frequently emanating from those whose lives are devoted to the mission of enforcing by all legitimate means the truths of Christianity upon a congregation.

The meeting called by the Royal Academy of Music at St. James's Hall to debate the question of musical pitch, resulted in nothing more tangible than the formation of a committee to consider and report on the matter. Twenty-five years ago the Society of Arts, after discussing the various standards of pitch, arrived at the decision that 528 vibrations for the note C should be the one adopted; and in the present year we are re-opening the subject as if no such fiat had ever gone forth. The truth is that whilst a number of individual interests are consulted we shall continue to have a variety of opinions; and in this free country, therefore, we can only hope that a standard pitch may be eventually agreed upon by an amicable compromise.

The Popular Ballad Concert Committee has recently held a meeting at the Mansion House, when beyond expectation, and the choir, numbering seventy voices, continued to do excellent service. movement should command the warmest sympathy and patronage of all music-lovers; and we are glad to find that a federation of existing Societies employed in providing recreation for the people is proposed, with the view of carrying on the work by combined, rather than by isolated action.

The new building, on the Thames Embankment, for the Guildhall School of Music (the first stone of which has already been laid) will be a substantial proof of the interest felt in the art by the City authorities; and we are glad to find that notwithstanding its removal, in remembrance of its origin, the name of the Institution is to be retained.

Unfortunately our obituary is this year unusually heavy. The death of Sir Julius Benedict came upon the musical world with an additional shock as he was slowly and, as it was hoped, surely recovering from a dangerous illness. The career of this eminent musician was sketched in our last number, and we have here only to repeat our regret that one so inseparably connected, in our mind, with a golden age in music, and a personal friend of many whose names will live in the history of the art, should be no more amongst us. To the last he was an earnest worker and a sincere enthusiast in the cause of the progress of music; and although not by birth an Englishman, he was ever so associated with all the best musical institutions of the country that his loss will long be felt by the many who relied upon his skill and judgment almost as a national calamity. Amongst the names of those eminent in the art who have passed away we have to record that of the accomplished and eminent contralto singer, Madame Sainton-Dolby. For some years she had given up appearing in public and devoted herself to teaching in a vocal academy of her own, producing, as might be expected, the most successful results, many of her pupils having already attained an excellent position in the Concert-room. In honour of her memory, it must be recorded that a scholarship is in the course of formation at the Royal Academy of Music, in which institution she received her artistic training, and to which she remained devotedly attached. We may also mention that she was the composer of several refined and melodious vocal works. Mrs. Meadows White, whose death occurred whilst in the zenith of her popularity, had by her numerous works placed herself at the head of English female composers. As Alice Mary Smith, she became known by a quartet of exceptional merit, and continued, even after her marriage with Mr. Meadows White, to produce compositions in various styles, some for orchestra alone, and others for voices with full instrumental accompaniments, a posthumous Cantata, recently published, and several MS. works, proving that up to the time of her decease her zeal as a creative artist had in no degree abated. The death of Mr. James William Davison removes from us one of the ablest writers on music in a day when the art was struggling to assert its real power in this country. That he exerted a most beneficial influence, not only in bringing to a hearing the greatest musical works, but in helping the public to understand them, cannot be doubted even by those who regretted that his conservative tendencies prevented his duly acknowledging what is now recognised as the "advanced school." As musical critic of the Times, he held a powerful sway for many years over his confrères; and his genial manner and well-stored mind always attracted around several donations and subscriptions in aid of the him a large circle of sympathetic and admiring cause were announced. It was stated that between friends. Mr. W. H. Holmes (whose death we have the months of October and May twenty-seven Concerts also to record) was one of the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music elected at the opening of the Insti-He obtained a high name as a pianist, and remained a Professor of the Academy until a short time before his decease, when, in consequence of failing health, he retired from the profession. Another well-known Professor, and former pupil of the Royal Academy of Music-Mr. Brinley Richardshas to be added to the list of those deceased during the year. As a zealous advocate of high-class music, a composer of several meritorious pianoforte pieces, and also of the popular air "God bless the Prince of Wales," and a lecturer on the music of the Principality, Mr. Richards earned a name which will be long remembered and respected. Mr. Handel Gear, a talented and much esteemed teacher of singing, and formerly a public vocalist, completes our record of deceased well-known musicians born or resident in England; but our obituary of foreign artists included Dr. Leopold Damrosch, the excellent and indefatigable Conductor, who died in New York, where his exceptional talents had been for years thoroughly appreciated; Herr Franz Abt, the popular composer of vocal music, whose death took place at Wiesbaden; Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, the composer, conductor, and intimate friend of Mendelssohn, who died at Cologne; and Alexander Reichardt, composer of numerous songs, one of which, "Thou art so near and yet so far," obtained a wide acceptance.

However uneventful may have been the past season, at least one hopeful fact may be gathered from its history—that the cause of English music is rapidly gaining strength, not only by the increased production of high-class works by native composers, but by their cordial reception in a country where for so many years both creative and executive musical art had been almost exclusively imported from the Continent. Further, indeed, we may point with pride to the warm welcome accorded to several of these works abroad; since if the patronage of foreign talent which so long prevailed in England should be succeeded by a corresponding patronage of English talent in foreign countries, we shall be amply compensated for the apathy and neglect which for years threw a shadow over the best efforts of British composers. Politically we must respect and preserve the boundaries of nations; but art has no boundary; and he who speaks to the world in the universal language of music should be received by the world as at least an earnest and sincere contributor to the material for its intellectual progress.

THE HISTORIC LOAN COLLECTION.

AT length this superb display of material illustrative of the history and development of musical art and science is assuming its final proportions, though even within the last week or two further additions have been made, and others, it is said, may yet come to hand. Further, although the labour of arrangement has been fulfilled by competent hands, a large number of articles, including the consignment from the museum of the Brussels Conservatoire, and that from Her Majesty the Queen, have not yet received their proper labels. Nor at present is it possible for the visitor to walk through the gallery of the Albert Hall catalogue in hand, although, we are glad to say, the representations made to the authorities as to the absolute necessity for such permanent record of the collection as a catalogue can give, have taken effect, and the work is now in hand. The public interest in this part of the Inventions Exhibition is rapidly increasing. In the morning the connoisseur may inspect the various treasures almost undisturbed, but towards evening visitors increase rapidly in numbers, and the descriptive abandoned. Much is told us of the enthusiasm notes, whenever already affixed, are read with eagerness. The centre of attraction is not unnaturally the series of Historic Music Rooms fitted up by Mr. George Donaldson. In the room on the left, representing an English interior of the eighteenth century, is one of the Hitchcock spinets mentioned in Mr. Hipkins's article in Grove's Dictionary. The middle room, fitted with Elizabethan furniture and tapestry, contains an Italian virginal, which may have belonged to the English Queen, although confirmatory evidence is wanting. The room on the right is a French salon of the time of Louis XVI., and contains a harp that belonged to George IV. and Marie Antoinette's harpsichord. This instrument was made by Ruckers in 1612, but has undergone much renovation, notably by Pascal Taskin in 1774. The paintings on the lid and sides are by Vandermeulen. The greatest curiosity in the way of keyed instruments is an upright spinet belonging to Count Correr of Venice. Its date is uncertain, but it probably was made not later than the closing years of the fifteenth century, and if so is the oldest known spinet. In the interior is a Calvary in carved and painted wood. In a Book by Adriano Banchieri, entitled "Conclusioni nel suono dell' organo," Bologna, 1608, the author states that the term spinet was derived from Spinetti, a Venetian, and that he had seen one bearing this inscription, "Joannes Spinetus Venetus, fecit, A.D., 1503." Now, it will be noted that the instrument in the Albert Hall comes from Venice. Is anything known of its history—or has it been carefully examined with a view of discovering any date or inscription? We ask this because the present label only gives the bare facts stated above. Another early spinet, about 1550, was smashed in pieces on the journey to London, but has been put together with consummate skill by a member of the firm of Broadwood and Sons. This instrument is curious as having the name of each note marked on the key, and it will be noticed that while the lowest is C the next is F, on the short octave principle, which was adopted not only in spinets but in all keyed instruments until the last century. Much has been written as to the object of this "short measure" in the lower octave of sixteenth and seventeenth century keyed instruments, but we think Mr. Hipkins's suggestion the most reasonable one, namely, that it was intended to supply dominant basses for cadences. In the organ some of the heavier pipes not needed for dominants or intonation were thus got rid of, and nothing was more natural than the application of the same principle to spinets and other instruments of the same family. In the organ in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, until it was remodelled two or three years ago, the lowest note of the manuals and pedals was F, but there was no F sharp. Among other items of the sixteenth century worth noting are the regal used at the historic Concerts a few weeks ago, and a "Bible regal," so called because when folded up it resembles a large Bible in appearance. This instrument, now very rare, may be regarded as the prototype of the modern harmonium. A little later we come to Nell Gwynne's virginal with a painting representing St. James's Park, lent by Messrs. Chappell, and a spinet by a maker named Hayward, of whom Samuel Pepys purchased one for £5, according to an entry in his diary. Of the "clavichord gebunden" there are several examples in the Brussels collection. Prior to the last century only the lower or natural keys of a clavichord had strings. The sharps were obtained by tangents directed towards these strings, C sharp for example being obtained by striking the C natural string at a reduced length. It was not until the time of Bach that this economical device was have further evidence of it in the form of a "clavecin brisé," or folding clavecin, which, on the authority of the Berlin Museum, from which it comes, the famous monarch was accustomed to take with him on his campaigns. Frederick was an autocrat, and there were no tiresome war correspondents to call in question his methods of occupying his leisure time. But we fancy a modern general, not desirous of incurring ridicule, and perhaps a charge of neglecting his duties, would scarcely carry a piano about with him while engaged on active service. Of a small travelling clavichord, of the date of 1726, it is said, though not on perfect evidence, that it was taken by Handel on his journeys, and that he composed on this instrument. It is not a little curious how prevalent the notion is that, when a musician wishes to compose a work, he sits down before an instrument and extemporises his music before committing it to paper. This may, and doubtless often is, done by composers of light pianoforte music, but the idea of Handel writing his operas and oratorios in such a manner is too ludicrous. More interesting is a double harpsichord, by Ruckers, 1612, which Mr. Hipkins believes to have been Handel's genuine instrument. The circumstantial evidence in favour of this view is strong. The composer left his musical possessions to his amanuensis, Smith, who, in gratitude for a pension allowed him after his employer's death, presented them to the king. Now this particular harpsichord was found some years ago in an obscure corner of Windsor Castle, and no one could give any account of its history, save that it was once in the State is a truly superb display of fiddles, and the satisfac apartments, and that visitors carried away the well worn ivories as relics. This would remove one difficulty in the Handelian supposition as the present keys are modern, and not worn through. A very beautiful harpsichord, by Schudi and Broadwood, in and there are doubtless some which have never beer 1773, is remarkable, like many other instruments of the period, for the fresh appearance of the keys. This is accounted for by the superiority of the ivory then in use. The last harpsichord ever made, or rather the last known to exist, is one on view, by It is said that harpsichords were Kirkman, 1798. made until 1800, but nothing is known of an instru-ment of so late a date. Why they should have sur-vived so long, and having done so have ceased to be made at this particular time, it is, at first sight, difficult to understand. To our modern ideas, the superiority of the piano over the harpsichord is so obvious that there is cause for wonder that the latter instrument did not become obsolete at least a generation earlier. But Burney tells us that, when upon John Christian Bach's coming to London, the harpsi-chord makers began to try their hands on pianos, their success at first was not great. Of one maker it is said that "the tone lost the spirit of the harpsichord, and gained nothing in sweetness." Besides, there was little or no music for the new instrument until Clementi led the way in 1773. The great harpsichord firms naturally disliked the innovation, and it was not until 1795, when the piano was substituted for the older instrument in the King's band, that the fate of the harpsichord was sealed in

It is time now to deal with the early pianofortes in the Exhibition, of which there are several highly interesting examples. The oldest is an upright grand by Friederici, dating from 1745, and probably the first of its kind ever made. Its action is entirely unlike other pianos of the same period, and has never for music of Frederick the Great, and here we especially interesting. Then there is the oldest known square, by Zumpe, 1766. Doubts, however, are thrown upon it being the first ever made by Zumpe, as the black keys are divided, making seventeen notes to the octave, and he would scarcely have been so ambitious at starting. This instrument at one time belonged to Dr. Crotch, from whom it passed to Sir George Smart, and then to the Messrs. Broadwood, who now exhibitit. The same firm also show a grand of the year 1798 in wonderful preservation. Here again the whiteness of the keys is remarkable, and certainly leads one to suppose that they must have been renewed not many years since; but we are assured that such is not the case. Of the same date is a rare example of an upright square, by Southwell, exhibited by Mr. Gilbey. The inevitable ugliness of its shape is atoned for by some well executed paintings by Angelica Kauffman. We have already noticed the grands decorated respectively by Mr. Tadema and Mr. Burne Jones, and there only remains to mention a pianino, with paintings by Mr. Tadema, which narrowly escaped destruction by the Regent's Park Explosion in 1874. It is said that scarcely anything else in the house was uninjured by the force of the explosion.

In passing to the bowed instruments, we in a measure remove from antiquarian to practical art Old claviers are only interesting as curiosities, but old violins by the most famous makers have a utilitarian value which, provided they escape injury, is always increasing. As we said two months ago, wher the exhibition was in a very incomplete state, there tion which the musician cannot fail to derive from inspecting them is only marred by the thought that they must remain silent. Probably so many valuable instruments have never before been brought together placed in proximity with each other since they issued from the workshops at Cremona or elsewhere. I was some time in the sixteenth century that violing began to take the place of the old viols, though whether the honour of the invention is due to Germany or Italy is open to conjecture; bu the balance of evidence is in favour of the penin sula. The earliest examples named in Hart's "The Violin and its Music" is one by Gaspard de Salo in 1566, and he adds that he cannot find any reliable evidence of Italian violin making at an earlie period. Now, in the Albert Hall there is a perfec shaped viola by Peregrino Zanetto, with the date 1500, and the label further states that it is one of the earliest known specimens of its class. Its presen owner is Lieutenant-Colonel Myles Sandys, but or what evidence its early date is given we are unable to say. In Fleming's "Old Violins and their Makers" we have the name Pelignino Zanetto, and it is said that a violoncello by this maker, with the date 1547 is in the Paris Conservatoire. There are many other interesting examples of the Brescian school, but we must pass from them to Cremona, which is splendidly illustrated, from its founder Andreas Amati to Joseph Guarnerius. Of Nicolaus Amati, the greatest of his family, there is a magnificent specimen known as the Alard, and referred to by Fétis as the finest in exis Mr. John Knoop. Another fine example, 1579, on which the glee writer, Stevens, has scratched by name, belongs to Mr. E. H. Pellowes. Of Stradi first of its kind ever made. Its action is entirely unlike other pianos of the same period, and has never been imitated. In the pianoforte article in Grove's "Dictionary" it is said of Friederici, "Of his action we know nothing; there is no description of it forthcoming." For this reason the Friederici piano is violin, and now the property of M. Charles Lamou-While on the subject of Stradivarius, we may mention that the beautiful guitar made by him in 1680, and mentioned in Grove's Dictionary, is here on view. The inside cannot be seen, as the rose is filled up with delicate tracery, representing a circular flamboyant window, and the maker has therefore cut his name, &c., on the back of the peg-box. There is a famous Guarnerius, 1714, referred to in Hart's "The Violin and its famous makers." It belonged for some years to Mr. Carrodus, and is now exhibited by Dr. G. W. Mackenzie. There are many English violins, but no very remarkable specimens, perhaps the best being one by Christopher Wise, 1650, a maker of whom little is known save that he lived in "Half-Moon Alley, without Bishopsgate," and that the few fiddles by him known to exist are good in shape and varnish. There are also a goodly number of German and Dutch make, but no specimen of sufficient note to warrant mention in this place. The French makers of the last century are well represented, and there is also a large consignment of modern instruments, the presence of which in a historic collection is somewhat difficult to account for. Among many beautiful violoncellos is one which it is said was made to order, and then laid up in cotton wool by its owner for a century! A curious method of treating a musical instrument truly, but the perfect preservation of the violoncello is in favour of the truth of the story. Here we shall leave the Loan Collection for the present. Other departments remain to be noticed, namely, the curiosities in the way of obsolete wind and stringed instruments, the manuscripts and early printed books, the autograph scores of the great masters, and the portraits and pictures relating to the art of music. There is a great deal of exceptional interest in all of these sections, and we shall return to them in our September number. Meanwhile we would urge on the executive the pressing need for the completion of the task of labelling the exhibits, and the issue of the catalogue. Fully half of the time during which the exhibition can be kept open has now expired. Apart from all other considerations, it is scarcely courteous to the authorities of the Brussels Conservatoire, for example, who have lent us their treasures, to merely place a ticket on each item with the words" Temporary label," and a formal description of the article. From the public point of view the matter scarcely needs any reference. The words "viol, 16th century," or "clavichord, 1680," convey no meaning to the outside world, but a detailed description attracts attention at once, as the most casual observation of the ways of visitors is sufficient to prove.

ALLEGRI'S "MISERERE."

THE recent performance of this work at one of the Historic Concerts at South Kensington may perhaps render the following remarks interesting to our readers:—

The services which are held during Holy Week in the Cappella Sistina of the Vatican have long been noted for their solemn and sensational character. On Wednesday, Maunday Thursday, and Good Friday the "Miserere," or 51st Psalm, is sung in presence of the Pope and cardinals. The office of these three evenings is called "Tenebræ," because at the close all lights are extinguished to express the darkness mentioned in the gospels, which covered the land at the crucifixion of Christ. The earthquake is also represented by beating the books or desks, and the old custom of clapping of prayer-books at our Good Friday Service was a curious remnant of the Catholic ceremony. But we have to speak of the music, and not of the service. The "Miserere" appears to have been first sung to a Faux-bourdon in 1514. Of this there is no trace, but from 1517 down to the present all the settings of the "Miserere," and they are many, appear to have been preserved. From 1517 to 1638 twelve composers tried their hand at it; the last was Gregorio Allegri, and so successful was he that his composition was adopted, not only as superior to those of his predecessors, but as the finest that could be possibly written. This was high praise, for among his predecessors was Palestrina. The Allegri "Miserere" was constantly sung until the year 1714, when a certain Tommaso Bai wrote a "Miserere," which appears to have been considered equal to that of Allegri. Anyhow, from that time the two were used, and at last it became the fashion to sing some of the verses to Allegri's music and others to that of Bai. The latter was very much like the former in contents and similar to it in construction; first a verse in five parts, then one in four parts; and, after several repetitions, a concluding verse with all voices combined (in Allegri, 9 parts; in Bai 8). In 1821, at the request of Pius VII., the abbé Baini wrote a new "Miserere." "All good things are three," says a German proverb, and this last of the settings was at once considered worthy of a place beside the other two; and, if we are not mistaken, it has now displaced

For more than a hundred years Allegri's music was jealously guarded by the Pope. Up to this time only three copies appear to have been made: one for the Emperor Leopold I., one for the King of Portugal, and a third for Padre Martini. Thus a composition, in itself extremely plain and simple, acquired a celebrity far beyond its musical deserts.

In 1770 the boy Mozart wrote down the "Miserere" during the performance of it at the Vatican. If the copy has been preserved it would prove an interesting relic, not on account of the music, which is now well known, but on account of the traditional abbellimenti (elaborate four-part cadenze) which he is said to have noted down so exactly that Cristoforo, the principal soprano, declared his performance perfect.

In that same year Dr. C. Burney visited Rome, and received from Cavalier Santarelli, Maestro di Capella to the Pope, "a true and genuine copy of the famous 'Miserere' of Allegri," and also copies of all the compositions performed in the Pope's chapel during Passion Week. A perusal of the music soon convinced the learned doctor that "it owes its reputation more to the manner in which it is performed than to the composition." He was of opinion that many of the "great effects might be justly attributed to the time, the place, and the ceremonials." The time was Holy Week, to devout Catholics one of the most solemn weeks of the year; the place, the Sistine Chapel, with its wonderful frescoes and architectural decorations; the ceremonials, prostration of the pope and conclave, extinguishing of the candles of the chapel and torches of the balustrate. And, besides, there was the striking effect produced by the singers in the last verse: the tones became softer, the temposlower, until the music, like the light, faded away, leaving the spectator to his meditations in darkness and in silence. It must be remembered that Dr. Burney, visiting Rome in the autumn, did not hear a performance of the Miserere; he was thus not led away by the impressions made by the service, and to him we owe the first description of the music, of any value from a purely musical point of view.

also represented by beating the books or desks, and the old custom of clapping of prayer-books at our Good Friday Service was a curious remnant of the "La Musica della Settimana Sancta"; and also the

In 1840, at Lugano, these two setting of "Bai." Misereres were published by Sig. Alessandro Geminiani (the nom de plume, we believe, of Cardinal Alfieri). The former, as we have seen, thought that he possessed a true and genuine copy at least of Allegri's composition. The latter, in a preface, states that he publishes the music to prevent musicians being led into error by the inexact manuscripts scattered about in Europe. It is somewhat disappointing to find that the two versions do not agree. One would naturally suggest that they should be compared with the autograph manuscripts of Allegri and Bai. But that would be difficult, if not impossible, for we believe the earlier one is lost.

Fétis, in his "Biographie universelle des Musiciens," tells us that Allegri corrected at different times his Miserere; that it was then revised and perfectionné by many singers and composers of the Chapel, who added to it all they considered desirable for a satisfactory performance. If singers and chapel-masters thus altered at will, it is not surprising that Dr. Burney, in 1770, should have obtained one version, and Sig. Geminiani a different one seventy years later. Were the work one of great importance every point of difference would be keenly discussed, and the best endeavour would be made to expunge from the text all additions and alterations. As the matter stands le jeu n'en vaut pas la chandelle. But it is curious to note this example of meddling, and possibly muddling; and if some standard operas were copied down as now sung and played at our opera houses, and compared with the composer's text, it would be found that the musical world has not mended its way. The Misereres of Allegri and Bai are also to be found in Choron's "Collection de pièces de Musique religieuse" and in Vincent Novello's "Periodical Collection of Sacred Music," and both are reprints from Dr. Burney's collection.

In connection with the alterations made by singers, the abbellimenti claim notice. Judging from the two printed versions mentioned, they-i.e., the singerschanged whenever and wherever they thought fit. But it would appear that cadenzas were introduced at special places. Sig. Geminiani has written down these abbellimenti, and indicated the places in both Misereres where they were — according to him—generally introduced. Among these we do not find the one which Mendelssohn heard at Rome, and which he minutely describes in a letter to Professor Zelter, dated June 16, 1831. We have spoken about the abbellimenti copied down by Mozart, and Dr. Burney, though he gives no specimens, mentions them, we believe, in his diary of his visit to Rome. Mendelssohn, speaking of those which he heard, says:—"The abbellimenti are certainly not of ancient date; but they are composed with taste and skill, and their effect is excellent." It is quite possible that similar additions were made by the singers even during the life-time of Allegri, but the whole matter is involved in considerable obscurity. Could the composer revisit this earth, and hear the music as now performed, he would probably, like Puff in Sheridan's "Critic," find it difficult to recognise his own composition. The music of the "Miserere" is complete without these embellishments, and as the tradition with regard to them is vague, they might well be omitted. The fourth abbellimenti given by Sig. Geminiani, for example, is certainly out of keeping with the music of the Miserere, whether it be Allegri's or not. The danger of putting new wine into old bottles could easily be avoided by leaving out these cadenze; and by following the oldest obtainable the composer's intentions.

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE.

In view of the recent meeting at the Mansion House, the present seems not an unfitting juncture to review some of the work done in the direction of bringing music within reach of the masses, and to record the experience of some practical workers in this field. In some respects we can do little more than endorse the statements made five years ago by Mrs. Julian Marshall, in the Nineteenth Century, in an admirable paper which summarised the achievements and prospects of a movement which has steadily advanced ever since. Such are her remarks upon the imperative necessity of securing first-rate performers in order to render classical music intelligible to the masses; the advantages of choral singing as involving social co-operation, and suggesting the possibility of individual participation in a performance; the obstacles thrown in the way of the movement by our social system, and sundry other pregnant criticisms for which we refer our readers to the article in question. To these we may add some further facts drawn from personal experience or supplied by the observation of competent judges. An uneducated audience, as it has been remarked to us, have a far keener appreciation for colour than for form. Classical music, therefore, has a far better chance when interpreted by a good violinist or singer than by a pianist. Indeed, when it is often impossible for a first-rate performer on that instrument to dominate the cackle of a London drawing-room full of cultivated persons, one can hardly find fault with their social inferiors for not being immaculate in this respect. Still there are pieces of classical music which if adequately rendered on the pianoforte will reach the hearts of the uncultivated populace; for one cannot insist too often on the statement quoted above, that the poorer the audience the finer should the performance of good music be; or as a correspondent has put it to us in homely language, "The public, rich or poor, like things slick—well done. Said things may be good or bad." Artisan audiences are often extremely critical, and in all efforts to educate them their capabilities and instincts, however rudimentary, should not be lost sight of. Thus they have often an admirable instinctive sense for rhythm and an excellent ear, though the means of manifesting these qualities may be only a clog dance or a penny whistle. Possessors of these two gifts, so essential to an executant, may be heard almost every day in our streets. "Street talent, and how to deal with it," might form the subject of an exceedingly interesting paper. Of one thing, however, we are certain, and that is that no possible advantage can accrue from the encouragement of such a grotesque exhibition as that recently witnessed at the Albert Palace, when a street organ-grinder appeared and sang three songs in Italian to the accompaniment of his instrument. The "warm and enthusiastic reception accorded to this somewhat eccentric musical innovation" has encouraged its promoter to offer, at some future time, "valuable prizes for a contest of street musicians." Such an announcement must cause a cold shudder to run through the frame of Mr. Comyns Carr and his literary confrères, and is enough to cause John Leech and Babbage to turn in their graves. By all means let street musicians be encouraged if they show talent, but, be it understood, with the object of removing themselves to a higher sphere. The worst German band that ever played is immeasurably superior, in our opinion—but we may be prejudiced—to the most improved specimen of the piano-organ—that endless reproducer of text the nearest approach possible would be made to vile vulgarity—that brutal butcher of good music. There is not a spark of life or stimulative influence ments of the art, which are costly and difficult to realise, require a concentration of attention which is not the people who profit by street musicians. These reap their richest harvest in the form of black mail, alms, or voluntary contributions from the prosperous quarters of the town; and their chief admirers are idle servant girls. An organ-grinder is the abomination of artistic desolation. He is not such a humiliating spectacle as a sandwich-man, but he is infinitely more aggressive, and not seldom belongs to the very scum of the continental criminal classes. In this sole particular are we advocates for musical protection. There is only one way of improving street music, so far as organ-grinders are concerned, and that is by improving them off the face of the English earth. Apologising to our readers for this outburst, provoked by an appropriate visitation from a singularly virulent instrument, whose throbbing arpseggios are, as we write these words, tingling viciously in our ears, we return to the matter in hand. There is no concealing the fact that of all the forms of music which can easily be presented, none is more universally popular or effective with a humble audience than a ballad. It is extremely probable, on the other hand, that a first-rate performance by a full orchestra of, say, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture would have an overpowering effect upon an East-End audience. But this is pure speculation, for the difficulties in the way of such an experiment remove it at present from the sphere of the practicable. The people love a ballad because it has a story, and will follow the course of it on their programmes with rapt attention. But the strong chance of success through the ballad medium, which singers of very mediocre capabilities possess before such audiences, indisposes them to leave the beaten track. They prefer certainties to experiments, and the singing of ballads, which within due limits is of a distinct value, threatens to usurp a sovereign instead of a subordinate rank in the repertory of popular Concerts. Artists of exceptional powers need not hesitate to essay the noblest music before the most humble audience. The essential point, as we have already indicated, is that the performance should be first rate. In proof of this we may mention that at a Concert held in the Victoria Coffee Hall, a few years back, no vocal item in the programme was more appreciated than Berlioz's "Absence," an uncompromisingly original and unusual song, of singular and refined beauty. It is perfectly true that limited intelligences love that which they know. should also bear in mind the other side of the question, a side admirably illustrated by Sir James Paget's remark that one of the most important elements in recreation is surprise. We can cordially re-echo all that a former writer on the subject has said with regard to the obstacles which our "endless class distinctions" throw in the way of the musical education of the people. Let the appearance of amateurs be limited so far as is possible to the platform. Performers themselves have assured us that nothing exerts so paralysing an effect upon them, at so-called Working Men's Concerts, as the sight of front rows packed with well-dressed but apathetic gentlefolk. At the outset the presence and co-operation of amateurs, ladies and gentlemen, is indispensable. But the history of the most successful organisations of the sort teaches the paramount importance of securing at as early a date as possible the co-operation of the people themselves, and the necessity of employing paid performers, and imposing small entrance fees. Music, to reach the lowest strata of all, must be gratuitous. But as it has hardly to be expected from those toiling for their very existence. In this sphere then there will remain a wide scope for leisured and philanthropic amateurs. From them the initiative must come, as it has come hitherto, and their assistance as organisers, as members of the chorus, and, in exceptional cases, as soloists, will continue to be both welcome and valuable. But for the adequate presentment of good music, by which alone it can be brought home to the masses, the employment of professional talent-vocal, and, to a still greater extent, instrumental-is, in the present state of things, an absolute necessity. While, then, a deep debt of gratitude is due to the great artists who from time to time have gratuitously volunteered their services in this cause, it has been conclusively established by the financial prosperity which attached in former years to the Birmingham Musical Association, and which still attaches to the Working Men's Concerts in Manchester, that the almost exclusive employment of efficient paid professional performers is compatible with an admission fee ranging as low as a few pence, and never higher than a shilling. Some brief account of the work contemplated and achieved by these excellent organisations may be not without interest to our readers. With the operations of the London Societies there are more opportunities for becoming familiar, through the medium of reports of such meetings as that held last month at the Mansion House, or articles like that on the work done by the Kyrle Society, by Miss Octavia Hill (Nineteenth Century, May, 1884), and we have, therefore, abstained from any detailed account of their doings. But the case is different with regard to the provinces. Moreover, since apart from their reputation as musical centres, Birmingham is generally considered the home of organisation, and Manchester of business-like common sense, the consideration of their exertions in this sphere should not be without its lessons. And, lastly, the operation of causes is easier to observe in smaller fields, where concentration and federation is easier than in our bulky metropolis. The Birmingham Musical Association was established in 1879, with the two-fold purpose of providing a continuous series of cheap Concerts, and giving instruction through the medium of classes and a musical library. The first half of this programme was admirably fulfilled from the outset, by the performance of oratorios, and instrumental and vocal music of a uniformly high level, with efficient principals. The promise of a library and instruction classes, however, was speedily abandoned. Believing, as we do, that this part of the scheme is fully as important as the other, we earnestly trust that it may be revived. We do not grudge one penny of the large sums of public money laid out in the purchase of good pictures at Birmingham, but we should be glad to think that her citizens had the same access to the thoughts of Beethoven as they have to the gorgeous landscapes of Müller. A musical library is an incalculable boon to a student, who cannot afford to purchase a score, inasmuch as it not infrequently affords him the only means of realising the intentions of the composer.

the presence and co-operation of amateurs, ladies and gentlemen, is indispensable. But the history of the most successful organisations of the sort teaches the paramount importance of securing at as early a date as possible the co-operation of the people themselves, and the necessity of employing paid performers, and the necessity of employing paid performers, and imposing small entrance fees. Music, to reach the lowest strata of all, must be gratuitous. But as it has been well indicated in the instructive article to which we have so frequently referred, the higher developsation dates from the establishment of a large unpaid band and chorus, the rent of rooms, conductor's salary, and all expenses being borne by the Association. Since the close of the fourth season, matters have gone hardly with it. Last year some $\int_{400}$ were required to make both ends meet, and this season the Concerts had to be abruptly brought to a close owing to the heavy deficit on the Concert account. It is not our province to inquire into the causes of the decline of a once flourishing organisation. Little difference has been observable in the character of the performances, save a marked increase in the number of purely ballad Concerts and the engagement of a somewhat inferior class of performers. There seems to be a lack of the cordial general support formerly lent to the Association. This has given place to a certain estrangement which is likely to prove fatal to the enterprise, for party feeling is not always confined to politics in Birmingham. matters stand at present, reconstitution or collapse seem to be the only alternatives for a society which has done a good work in the past, and whose untimely decline cannot be due to irremediable causes. The annals of the Working Men's Concerts in Manchester illustrate successive stages of a steady progress towards federation and concentration. Started originally about the same time as the Birmingham Musical Association, they depended at first upon the volunteered aid of amateurs and occasionally of professional performers. They were miscellaneous in character, were held in the outlying town halls, and from the very first attracted large audiences-the number being generally limited by the accommodation-of respectable working-men. The next step was an arrangement by which local amateur choral societies assisted in turn, performing oratorios, cantatas, and miscellaneous vocal music. Finally, in 1882, the Council of the Working Men's Clubs' Association, under whose auspices these Concerts are given, decided on the appointment of a paid director; and, since that date, Mr. de Jong has held this post to the general satisfaction of all concerned. The number of Concerts was raised from ten to fifteen after the first season of his management, and the average attendance has numbered about 3,400, upwards of 2,000 of whom pay 4d. for their seats, the price of which ranges up to 1s. Programmes containing all the words are supplied at one penny each. The character of the music is mainly popular and vocal, varied by selections performed by military bands and instrumental solos, while local choral societies lend their aid for the performance of glees, choruses, part-songs, and other concerted music. The soloists are generally local professionals, and the bands those of the garrison. All performers are paid for their services, and the pecuniary result is very satisfactory, the net receipts having thus far more than covered the expenses of the Concerts. is pleasant to add the experience of the Director whose courtesy in supplying us with some of the foregoing statistics we beg to acknowledge—that "the behaviour of the audience has always been most orderly; they listen most attentively, and their discretion in applause is most wonderful.

While treating of Manchester, it would be ungracious not to refer to the admirable efforts of the Ancoats Recreation Committee to penetrate to the very lowest and poorest social levels, and dispel the dulness which broods over them by healthy amusements and stimulating instruction. Their scheme includes twenty-six free Sunday afternoon lectures, from September to February, before and after each of which there is half-an-hour's music from a local stringed by local choirs; band contests for local brass and drum and fife bands for prizes, awarded by the committee; and "at homes," where instrumental and vocal music is performed by amateurs or professionals who generously give their services. Amongst the latter may be mentioned the name of Herr Straus, the well-known leader and violinist. So, too, Madame Néruda has played in former years at the Working Men's Concerts to the great delight of her audience. Of the nature of the music performed by the local stringed band in Ancoats we have nothing but commendation, for Mr. Rowley is an enthusiast, and will have none but what is good, and this intention is the best earnest of future perfection, disarming criticism of present shortcomings in execution.

The report of the work done by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee shows many points of resemblance to the provincial organisations we have just described. We find the same catholic taste exhibited in the composition of the programmes, the same or much the same fees for admission, and, as elsewhere, we observe that valuable assistance has been rendered by military bands and distinguished artists. But while we notice the amateur element, as is natural, to be more largely represented among performers in London than in the provinces, the chief cause for satisfaction is the signal success which has attended the establishment of music-classes, no less than twenty-two of which are now in existence, attended by 1,200 students, "all drawn from the wage-earning classes," and who, for nominal fees, which only cover one-third of the expense, receive instruction in harmony, choral singing, and various instruments. This is, perhaps, the most encouraging feature of the report, proving the feasibility of that which the Birmingham Musica Association abandoned without a trial. But we are chiefly concerned with a suggestion made in the course of the eminently practical discussion which followed, namely, that a conference should be called "to consider the possibility of forming a scheme for the federation of the existing societies engaged in providing recreation for the people, with the object of ascertaining whether this work can be accomplished by combined instead of isolated action.' Such a conference the Lord Mayor has consented to call, and we trust that the matter may shortly emerge from the stage of discussion into that of action For the unwieldiness of London, and the immense distances which sever the workers in this cause from the field of their exertions, place it on a different footing from cities like Birmingham, or even Manchester, which can effect their aims by a central and compact organisation. Speaking of the work done by the Kyrle Society's Choir, Miss Octavia Hill brings out this point with considerable force. "The singers reach home very late at night owing to the enormous distances. Often they have to go as far beyond Aldgate Station as that is from Hyde Park; in fact at Aldgate they feel almost home, so far does that waste of small houses extend, which we call the Eas-End. This fact serves to show how far many of the audiences live from the main centres of good, chear music." A financial gain would almost undoubtedly result from such a system of federation, for isolated efforts are pretty sure to be more expensive that combined action. On this head, again, Miss Hil has some remarks which are worth quoting. "So has some remarks which are worth quoting. large a body of volunteers requires—so my experience teaches-always a certain amount of paid work i their full power is to be made available. Kind as they are, one cannot expect conductors, organists accompanists, and professional singers, to give thei time week after week." By the federation of these band, formed by the secretary, Mr. Charles Rowley; societies a better distribution of resources, of talents weekly choral open-air Concerts, in June and July, and of labour would probably be secured. And it would he much harder in such an ampler organisation for any amateur or official to make his exertions a means of self-glorification, which is always one of the dangers of isolated philanthropy. On this head we cannot refrain from transcribing the following admirable sentences from the writer whom we have already laid under such heavy requisition. "If we are to combine in musical art work all sense of favours conferred or received must be put aside. What is wanted is association; and unless the upper classes are finally to be excluded from progress, the example must emanate from themselves." The proposal which immediately follows this passage, to the effect that amateurs should themselves join the instructionclasses established for the poorest classes, though admirable in vacuo, presents insuperable difficulties. A working-man will readily receive instruction from his social superior, but we doubt whether he would care to have him as a fellow pupil. And we are not aware that such an experiment has been found to answer in other subjects. There is no question, however, that many amateurs would profit largely from such teaching.

It only remains for us in conclusion to utter a few words of warning, of suggestion, and of explanation. We hope that these instruction classes, the success of which is so gratifying, may never come to be considered a rough and ready method for the manufacture of professional performers. There is a fatal ten-dency amongst us to regard art as a means to an end, and it would not be surprising if some such notion were to emerge in the minds of inexperienced students of humble position. The production of performers is going on at such a rate amongst us, that the market is in danger of being overstocked, and it is the extension of intelligent audiences, of the demand, in fact, that is needed. On the other hand, the attainment of such proficiency as will render the student competent to take part in concerted music is a wholly laudable and commend-able ambition. And this brings us to the region of suggestion. We would earnestly commend to all manufacturers and employers of labour on a large scale, the example set by Mr. Platt, at Oldham, who has formed an excellent band and chorus exclusively out of his employés. The aid lent by military bands to the movement is, as we have seen, of great value and importance, but it admits of still further extension. We would have street music minimised, but band-playing in parks maximised, if we may use such a word. As it is, many provincial owns are better off in this respect than London. Finally, let it be distinctly understood that in the course of the foregoing remarks it has not been our ntention in any way to disparage amateur work, or amateur performance. Our contention is simply this, that for the higher musical education of the people, reater interpretative skill is necessary than is possessed by the great majority of amateur perormers.

OBSERVATIONS ON MUSIC IN AMERICA

By Joseph Bennett.

VI.—ELEMENTARY MUSICAL EDUCATION IN BOSTON.
INTELLIGENT visitors to America always expect to ind its highest form of intellectual life, and things ninistering to it, within the bounds of Massachusets. This is natural to an Englishman, who, proud of its own country, remembers that in the historical resterday, a new England was founded beyond the cas by strong, God-fearing men and women from he old home—men and women who were faithful and courageous, and, though not free from the narrow items of their age, loved liberty and light. The Englishman in Massachusets feels himself a sharer in the glory of that famous commonwealth, and a blood-brother of her illustrious sons. He looks upon Bunker Hill, or visits Lexington and Concord with no twinge of mortification, but rather as he would stand upon the battlefield of Marston Moor or Naseby—rejoicing in the valour with which men of his race have rebuked tyrants. Nowhere out of the parent isle does he feel more at home than in the old State. The names of its cities and villages are those with which he has been familiar from childhood; he recognises around him the features of Anglo-Saxon life; and in literature and art he beholds a stream flowing from the same fountain as that which blesses the mother land.

Influenced by sympathy arising out of many ties, the English visitor to Boston is apt to put on rosecoloured spectacles, and, for my own part, I confess that on many points the actual state of things did not surpass anticipation. Especially was this the case as regards the magnificent public schools, which are, I should say, the special glory of the "Hub. I expected to find in them everything of the best-all that ingenuity could devise and experience elaborate to the end of a well-instructed community. It was, therefore, with no small interest that, under the guidance of my esteemed friend, Mr. Bacon (of the Boston Herald), I visited several schools, chiefly for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the system of musical education, but also in a measure to gratify a large curiosity regarding those famous institutions. It is no part of my present duty to discuss the subject in its entire aspect, but I may be permitted a few remarks of a general nature before entering upon others more specific.

The public school buildings of Boston have scarcely such imposing architectural features as those erected in London under the auspices of our School Board. But it should be remembered that the latter are the creation of yesterday, while the former represent a system established and in working order when we had no system at all. The Boston buildings seem admirably adapted to the purpose they serve. They are spacious, light and airy; capitally arranged for graduated teaching, and kept scrupulously clean. was struck with the perfect order reigning in all of them that came under my notice, and not less with the unmistakable evidence of the firm and gentle discipline from which order springs. The children, bright of aspect and neat in appearance, seemed thoroughly interested in their duties; while their teachers, both male and female, answered, in bearing and speech, to the class which we in England describe as "gentle." Indeed, the whole tone of the schools seemed healthy, and adapted to exercise a perfect influence for good upon the young people made subject to it. One feature impressed me as peculiar. Each of the girls' schools I visited was presided over by a gentleman, having under him a staff of lady assistants. The arrangement I am told, works well in several important respects, especially from an administrative point of view. These schools are very large establishments, making heavy demands upon skill, energy, and tact, and necessitating the existence of those qualities in their highest forms. I sought no opportunity of testing the results of the general educational methods adopted. Indeed, from what I casually observed, I should have thought twice before setting myself up as an examiner of the children on any subject within their curriculum. The chances are that my own ignorance would have been much more fully exposed than their knowledge.

he old home—men and women who were faithful instruction in the Boston public schools; much the iews of their age, loved liberty and light. The vast majority of teachers use, for quite intelligible course. reasons, the system known as Tonic Sol-fa, but this girls ros is simply the result, as I understand, of their own choice. Over yonder, certain school districts are placed in the charge of certain professors, by whom musical education is directed according to the method each considers to be best. This, of course, entails divergence; but not, as far as I could discover, to any great extent. The principles involved seemed to me much the same; though their working out offered variety of procedure. It was my good fortune to make acquaintance with two of these district superintendents - intelligent and enthusiastic gentlemen, with a firm belief in their respective Shibbolethsand, under their guidance, to see the young New Englanders studying the A B C of the divine art.

In no case was it thought necessary to substitute any signs for those of the recognised notation. The exercises were in the ordinary staff, and performed with ease and accuracy more than sufficient to show that, provided right methods be followed at the outset, there is no need for another written language of music. It was instructive to observe, moreover, with what alacrity the children turned to their music lesson. Evidently, the study had been made interesting to them, which, of course, implies that it had been made clear. Boys and girls are rarely inattentive or "bored" when they are conscious of learning, and these youngsters appeared to take the keenest interest in the exercise of their faculties of observation and deduction as applied to music. More complete knowledge, as far as it went, I have rarely met with. There was no sham about it— sham, let me add, is easily detected by anybody who has had experience of school life. In this case, suspicion of it was impossible. The promptitude of the answers given, and the confident manner of the vocal exercises proved beyond question that the children were masters of the subject within the scope of their examination. In every instance they were severely tested, but failed not once. Their sight singing-with the ordinary notation, bien entenduastonished me. Before the higher classes, passages of genuine difficulty were set only to be read off with hardly a noticeable blunder; and when the teacher, making a staff with the fingers of his left hand. indicated with those of his right passages in two and three-part harmony, he was followed with almost absolute exactness. I hasten to add that these merits were not confined to one school, or to one district. I met with them everywhere, and they served for conviction that in the Boston elementary schools music is taught with remarkable intelligence and success. How long this has been going on I cannot say, but the next generation of Bostonians should be in a high degree artistic, as far as technical instruction can secure that end.

I had one special opportunity of judging results on the point of taste and skill in singing. No sooner did I express a desire to hear a mass of children perform some pieces, than, with ready courtesy, the ordinary work of the upper classes in a large school was suspended; each class forming in order within its own room. I was then taken to the large hall, where the professor seated himself at the pianoforte and began playing a march, to the rhythm of which the girls entered with erect bearing and measured step. When all were seated, the march ceased, books were distributed, and the performance began. I was charmed with the singing, so true was it and, everybody but myself seemed to take as a matter of practice in singing them." How well these principles

After some time spent in this fashion, the girls rose by signal, the march resumed, and the classes retired in order as they came.

My readers are now ready to put the question: How are these results attained? Much is, no doubt, attributable to good teachers, apt at imparting instruction, and zealous in the discharge of their duties; much, also, to the uncommon intelligence of children belonging to a highly educated community. But I think the methods employed deserve the greatest amount of credit. These, as already pointed out, differ on many points; but, as regards essentials, have so much in common that it may be said of them, Ex uno disce omnes. I am, therefore, justified in confining myself to one for the present purpose.

Before me lies a little book entitled "Manual for the Use of Teachers; to accompany the Readers and Charts of the Normal Music Course." Its authors are John W. Tufts and H. E. Holt; its publishers D. Appleton and Co., of New York, Boston, Chicago, and San Francisco. With the reader's good leave, I will point out the salient features of the course of instruction there laid down. Few of these may be absolutely new; but it is in their combination and relative importance that the value of the system lies. A cardinal principle is thus expressed at the outset:

"A knowledge of musical sounds should be given by presenting, comparing, and naming them orally to the ear as relative mental objects, on precisely the same principle that the eye should be trained to number with material objects. We should never lose sight of the fact that in music we are not only teaching that which we cannot see, but that of which we can give no idea by any picture or drawing. . . In music we deal with the reality in order to gain any knowledge of it. When this fact is fully appreciated we see that in the study of the subject, we must appeal entirely to the sense of hearing and to the feelings thus awakened and stimulated.

Carrying out the idea thus stated, immense pains are taken to fix the scale in the minds of the pupils as firmly as the letters of the alphabet or the numerals; the process being continued "until the singers can take any sound of the scale in which they are singing," and not only so, but until, "when passing into any other scale in which the same pitch occurs, the sounds of that scale are readily adjusted in their minds, and the new key easily established." It was in the last-named exercise that the Boston children surprisingly excelled. The teacher would write a phrase in one key, and follow it by another having a different signature, but continuing the last note of the first into the first note of the second. youngsters had no difficulty whatever in passing from one tonality to the other, the sounds of the new scale being at once "adjusted in their minds." far the system runs parallel with the Tonic Sol-fa, and all others deserving to be called philosophical. Passing on, I find it stated that "a sense of rhythm or recurring accent can be awakened only by hearing such rhythms and accents." Consequently, a mental conception of the thing is formed before the pupils are troubled with the character employed to represent it. Simplification of this kind runs through the entire system, which refuses to burden the pupil with anything not essential to the primary object of singing at sight. "Everything necessary to enable the pupils to do this intelligently should be taught, all else should be postponed until this is attained.... There should be no questions or explanations on the part of the in an unaffected way, so expressive. Pieces were sung in two, three, and four-part harmony, with pianoforte accompaniment; no failure of any kind occurring to mar a display the excellence of which mental pictures of their true representation through work I had an opportunity of seeing. The children had nothing before them but their "mental picture" of the scale, yet when the teacher called out the numbers representing the relation of the various sounds to the tonic, the sounds themselves were produced with a rapidity and accuracy most remark-

With very young children the system under notice employs singing by ear, in order to awaken and develop tone perception at the earliest period and to train the voice. Singing, as an accompaniment to marching or gymnastic exercises, is absolutely forbidden, because tending to encourage a noisy and careless use of the voice. "Correct habits in using the voice, good phrasing, distinct articulation and accurate pronunciation, should all be taught by an imitation of the example given by the teacher. Harsh and noisy sounds should not be allowed."

In teaching time, the system does not at first trouble the pupil with characters representing duration of sound or silence. He is taken, so to speak, behind these, and an endeavour is made to create a conception of the regular accents of the measure, "wasting no time in talking upon the subject, or trying to demonstrate the fact that sounds may be long or short." Accent, as well as time, is taught by the use of syllables indicating the various pulses, strong and light, of a measure; but "the teacher must never accept these time names as an answer, unless they are given at regular intervals and with the proper accent. Without this observance they mean nothing and are useless." In such a manner is the principle carried out that there must be in the mind of the pupil a distinct conception of the thing before its sign can be accepted. This, in fact, is the distinguishing feature of the system-a feature long applied to the teaching of other branches of knowledge when musical students were groping about among a lot of arbitrary and, to them, almost un-meaning symbols. Rests are taught in the same manner as sounds, and distinguished to the ear by emitting the time-names in whispers instead of with the full voice.

During all these early exercises the pupil sees no note of music. But, having clearly in his mind the pitch of the sounds of the scale and their relation to each other, he is taught their representation to the eye. The teacher, having the staff upon a black board, writes the G cleff upon it, and says, "Sing one." The pupils sing the lowest note of the scale. "What is its pitch?" They answer, "C." The teacher then makes a note upon the first added line below the staff, saying, "This is its place." He proceeds, "Sing one, two." The pupils do so, "What is the pitch?" "D." The teacher writes a note upon the first space below the staff, saying, "This is its place." And so on throughout the scale of C. The scale of D is next taken, the others following in order; and it has been found that the pupils, owing to their mental mastery of the scale as regards the pitch and relationship of its sounds, conquer the written language with surprising ease.

The details I have presented serve to show intelligent readers the main principles of the Boston method. For fuller details I refer them to the book itself. But it already appears that the secret of the success attained lies in the persistent study of the scale till its component parts become so fixed in the mind as to be recognised without conscious volition, like the alphabetical letters. To this end all energies are bent, and when it is once gained the rest gives no

My visit to the Boston schools afforded me infinite rate, they bore the writer no grudge, for when their satisfaction, because it showed the effective training grand new organ stood ready for opening, Bach was of a whole community in the elementary principles of invited to assist at the ceremony of "trying" the

the most adaptable and refining of the arts. When all American children are so instructed, their country will come within measurable distance of the goal towards which we in England are now striving, and may look forward, as England does, to a time when false ideas in art will have less power than now, and blind and incompetent guides will find their business gone.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS By Joseph Bennett.

We shall now see with what honest indignation Bach repelled the charge of having flirted with the Halle people in order to obtain a higher salary from the Grand Duke of Weimar. Here is his answer:

"Most Noble, Illustrious, and Learned, most Honoured Sir,-That the very worshipful Collegium should be surprised at my refusal of the post of organist, of which—as they suppose—I was ambitious, does not at all surprise me, for I perceive that they can have considered the matter very little. They suppose that I greatly desired the above-mentioned post of organist, while nothing could be farther from my mind. This much I know, that I offered myself, and that the most worshipful Collegium much desired me; for I, after presenting myself, was minded to travel away at once, when I received Dr. Heineccius' command and politely remained, though I was not compelled, to compose and conduct the piece you know of. Moreover, it is not to be presumed that a man should go to a place where he injures his position. This, however, I could not accurately ascertain in from fourteen days to three weeks, for I am quite of opinion that a man cannot ascertain what his wages are in any place—as the perquisites must be reckoned as part of the pay—even in a few years, much less in fourteen days, and this is in some degree the reason why I accepted the nomination, and, on the ground of my (unsatisfied) desires, gave it up. Still, from all this, it is a long way to concluding that I have played a trick on the worshipful Collegium in order to move my gracious master here to increase my salary, since His Highness has already shown so much favour to me and my art that I had no need to travel to Halle for an increase of salary; thus I regret that the certain conviction of the most worshipful Collegium should have led to such a very uncertain issue; and to this I would add: Even if I were to get as good payment in Halle as here in Weimar, should I not still be bound to prefer the former service to the new? You who understand law and equity may best judge of this, and I would venture to request you to lay this, my justification, before the most worshipful Collegium, and remain, most honoured Sir, yours obediently, Joh. Seb. Bach, Concertmeister and Court Organist." Now it must be admitted that there is something to

Now it must be admitted that there is something to say for the Halle people. If Bach did not desire the place, why did he apply for it, and fulfil certain of the conditions imposed on candidates. If he did desire the place, and the Collegium, as was natural, wished to secure so eminent a man, we need not be surprised that his withdrawal led to some soreness and want of charity. On the other hand, Bach's letter was a perfectly proper one under the circumstances. Not for a moment could he rest under a suspicion of having played a trick, and in repudiating the accusation he tempered spirit with respect. His letter, in short, reads like the letter of a true gentleman. It seems to have impressed the Halle people. At any rate, they bore the writer no grudge, for when their grand new organ stood ready for opening, Bach was invited to assist at the ceremony of "trying" the

how much this token of amity pleased him:

"Most Noble Gentlemen, and you particularly Highly Honoured Sir,—I am deeply obliged by your honour's very particular and gracious confidence, and by that of the whole very most honoured Collegium; and, as I always find the greatest pleasure in waiting on your worship, I shall now more than ever endeavour to make my services acceptable to your worship, and to give satisfaction to the utmost in the examine required of me. I would beg you accordingly to communicate this my resolution to the most honoured Collegium without delay, and at the same time to offer to them my most humble greeting, and my dutiful respects for the special confidence with which they have favoured me. I also beg to acknowledge with obedient gratitude all the trouble your worship has been pleased to take for me in many ways up to this time, and will take again, and I shall have the greatest pleasure, so long as I live, in subscribing myself, most honoured Sir, your worship's devoted Servant, Joh. Seb. Bach, Concertmeister."

In the examination of the Halle organ Bach was associated with Kuhnau and Rolle, all three agreeing as to the excellence of the instrument. This took place in April, 1713, four months after a visit to Leipzig, made by Bach with, perhaps, not the smallest presentiment of the fact that the Saxon town was destined to be the scene of his fullest labours. The master paid this visit for purely artistic reasons, and during his stay conducted a musical service at St. Thomas's, or some other church. One of his cantatas entered into the programme. A curious circumstance has handed down the facts just stated. In order to avoid mistakes, Bach wrote the order of service in the score of the cantata, and to this we owe acquaintance with the circumstances of his debût in the city where he was to reside for twenty-seven years. "He opened the service," says Spitta, "with a prelude, followed by a motett; then came a prelude to the Kyrie. After the intonation by the preacher in front of the altar, the reading of the epistle, and the singing of the litany, came the prelude to the chief choral, in which he could display his skill in choral arrangement. Then the gospel was read; and, next, Bach introduced the chief music ('Haupt-musik'), which on this occasion was his own cantata, by a prelude on the organ. After the sermon followed the communion, with another prelude to a choral; finally, he had to close the service, and here again could put forth all his powers in an organ piece on the grandest scale." No doubt he did put forth all his powers, and made much talk of a strange organist among the church-going burghers that Advent Sunday.

In the year 1714, Bach, as Concertmeister, had a very congenial duty imposed upon him by the Grand Duke. This was the composition of a number of sacred pieces every year, in association with Salomo Frank, by whom the poetical text was provided. The joint labour was not entered upon till 1715, but thenceforward the production of church cantatas went steadily on. Bach, however, had not yet reached his highest point in cantata writing. The master's Weimar period, rich to excess in organ work, was but a blossoming time as regards cantatas. Leipzig saw the fruition later on. "The strength of these Weimar Cantatas," says Spitta, "consists in the solos, of which the wealth of ideas, the variety and perfection of form, compel our amazement. Each melody bears its peculiar stamp, in each piece an individual emotion is thoroughly treated, and even in the most dissimilar the composer has succeeded with marvellous versatility in doing full justice to the subjects. The music inconceivable such power should ever decay: the most complicated, technical problems are solved with such a quiet certainty that they never occur to us as such. The conception of the words shows an intensity of feeling entirely devoted to the Church, and utterly free from any blemish of secular shallowness. His idea is always concentrated on the whole solemnity of meaning of each separate Sunday; and if the text is inadequate to the thorough bringing out of the chief thought, he grasps it in his deepest meaning, and gives it its right form by means of his music.

The master's attention was not wholly taken up by compositions of this class. His position put him at the mercy of Court circumstances, and when the Grand Duke desired a cantata for a hunting festivity Frank and Bach had no choice but to set their wits to work and make one. Thus it happened in 1716; the result being one of those ponderous classical allegories in which the age delighted. Diana and Endymion, Pales and Pan all figure in it, and utter a lot of well-turned verse in the style which modern America calls "high falutin." Bach, we are told, took a great interest in the composition, as it was probably his first work of the kind, and "it contains much charming music." But it is tolerably clear that the author did not go out of himself to write it, two airs being subsequently transferred to the Cantata "So God the Father loved the world." Spitta says: "If such transference from one work to another of a different kind be possible, there can be no difference in style between Bach's sacred and secular compositions. And no such difference does actually exist. Bach's style was sacred, and the sacred style was Bach's. He does not put it on and off like a vestment, but uses it always without thinking of it, because his style of composition had developed naturally with his growth, and he could not express himself in any other way. In some details of the secular cantatas he attempts to gird himself somewhat more loosely, and, indeed, a greater degree of grace is there perceptible. But, on the whole, his pure polyphonic style is retained in both to an equal degree." This is true to the letter, but by no means peculiar to Bach. It applies in some measure to all German and English composers of the period, and Handel, as every amateur knows, wrote a deal of music which the taste of his day found as acceptable with sacred words as with secular, and vice versa.

Our master went on writing church cantatas till 1717, in the autumn of which year he diverted himself with a journey to Dresden, where the magnificent Frederic Augustus was carrying things, artistic and other, with a high hand. The famous French organist, Marchand, was also on a visit to the Saxon capital, and it followed, as a matter of course, that the presence of two men so eminent in their respective countries excited feelings of rivalry and partisanship. Marchand is described as fourteen years older than Bach, and as having both the merits and defects of his nationality. "He was highly gifted in qualities of technique, his art was thoroughly elegant, and he well knew how to turn these talents to the best account; but he was, at the same time, full of vanity and petty caprice." In high favour at the Saxon Court, which took no notice of Bach, Marchand raised against himself all who stood up for native art and German interests. These urged Bach to challenge the Frenchman to a trial of skill, and, after some precautions, the master complied. Marchand, of course, accepted -much, perhaps, as Goliah accepted the challenge of his rustic antagonist—a jury was named, and preparations were made for combat. The day of battle came; the jury assembled, a large and excited com-pany gathered; Bach put in an appearance, but so flows so untiringly and spontaneously that it is utterly did not Marchand. All waited, still the French

Where was he? At that champion delayed. moment on the top of a coach, flying from Dresden, and what he knew would be certain defeat, with the atmost speed that the roads of the period allowed. In thus running away Marchand exemplified the discretion which is said to be valour's better part; while in being left undisputed master of the field, Bach gained immense renown, and raised himself greatly in the esteem of his compatriots. But he by no means despised Marchand. Indeed, he used to play the Frenchman's clavier music with enjoyment.

Bach's victory failed to secure the attention of Frederic Augustus and his Court, just then engrossed by an Italian Opera Company under the celebrated Lotti. It does not appear that the two great composers ever met, though in the same city together, and the fact is much to be regretted. The Italian might have fascinated the German, and even induced him to visit the "land of song," with results of which one can only say now that they might have been momentous indeed. Bach returned to Weimar in October, and took part in solemnly celebrating the bi-centenary of the Reformation. His career there was, however, rapidly drawing to an end. Annoyed at having been passed over when a new Capellmeistergeneral was required at Court, Bach readily accepted an invitation to act in that capacity under Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen. In November the duties of his new situation were entered upon; the master's pupil, Schubart, succeeding him at Weimar. It should be said here that Bach was not appointed organist as well as capellmeister at Cöthen. He never again took upon himself officially the responsibilities of such a post.

The master's title at Cöthen was "Capellmeister and Director of the Prince's Chamber Music," his salary being 400 thalers. He had nothing whatever to do with organs and organ playing, but served a highly intelligent and musical young prince in a capacity more congenial to the employer, if not to the employed. The band placed under him seems to have been a good one. At any rate, it contained several eminent names, among them that of Abel, the viol-di-gamba player - father of the Charles Frederic Abel, some time so well known in London. Of Bach's official work at Cöthen even the keen-nosed Spitta has discovered next to nothing. "Time," says the biographer, with unwonted eloquence, "has effaced or overgrown almost every trace of his labours, as the grass has overgrown the castle-yard which the master must so often have crossed; and his name has died out among the people of the place almost as completely as the sounds with which he once roused the echoes of the now empty and deserted halls." Yet it is certain that Bach was very happy in his obscure labours. His young master loved and prized him so much that where the one went the other must needs go; and, removed from church work, the composer could give up his time to purely instrumental music, which he then began to write industriously, producing, amongst other things, the immortal "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues,"

In May, 1718, Bach went with his Prince to Carlsbad, in company with six other members of the Court band, and in the autumn of the following year he paid a visit, on his own account, to Halle. Records of these and other journeys during the Cöthen period are in existence, and serve to throw some light upon a term in the master's life which otherwise had very little publicity. The visit to Halle might have been very famous, since Handel made pilgrimage to his birthplace that year, and it is probable that both these famous composers were for to Handel, Spitta says: "On his return journey he remained for a short time with his family at Halle, and Bach sought him out, but was so unlucky as to find that Handel had that very day set out for England." On the question whether Bach or Handel were most to blame for their never meeting, Spitta makes sensible remarks. He rather censures Bach in the first instance, remarking: "We nowhere find any indication that he intentionally took himself out of Bach's reach by leaving Halle on the day of Bach's arrival there; while, on the other hand, it is difficult to overlook the fact that Bach, in this first attempt at a meeting, merely availed himself of an opportunity. Otherwise, as Handel had been in Germany since the previous March, he might have arranged a meeting somewhere or other." But, when con-sidering incidents of this kind and awarding praise or blame, we should be careful to put ourselves in the place of the individuals concerned. It seems to us very important that the two great masters should have met, and given to musical record a memorable incident. On the other hand, neither of them suspected that they were, even in such a matter, making history for the eager discussion of unborn generations. To them, probably, the question of meeting or not meeting was one for no more than a passing thought, and it behoves us, who see it in a very different light, to remember the fact when the conduct of one or both is called in question.

In May, 1720, Bach again accompanied the Prince to Carlsbad, and, during his absence, a catastrophe happened at home. The circumstances of this disaster were peculiarly sad, and almost dramatic in the manner of their revelation to the principal sufferer. During his stay in Carlsbad, Bach received nothing save good news from the domestic circle, and he left the Bohemian town for Cöthen, with pleasant anticipations of a welcome from wife and children. As far as concerned the children, these were realised, but there was no wife to greet the husband. Poor Maria Barbara, the "stranger maiden" of Bach's courting days, and the mother of his seven children, had passed away in his absence, and was lying peacefully in the churchyard, when the master expected to take her to his arms. This was a stunning blow, but Bach bore up manfully, as became a nature not less strong than tender, and in the autumn of the same year we find him in Hamburg, possibly for the performance of a cantata he had composed a little while before. There he again came into contact with organs and organists; and there, as a consequence, the flame of his old passion for church work began to blaze up This induced him to become a candidate for the post of organist at St. James's Church, where was a large four-manual organ. Bach could not stop for the competition, but promised to write from Cöthen and say whether he still desired the place. He did so write, expressing that desire; but the church authorities elected one Heitmann, an "illustrious obscure." Here is no mystery. In view of the election, the committee passed a resolution as follows, and absolutely recorded it: "That, no doubt, many reasons might be found why the sale of the organist's appointment should not be made a custom, because it appertains to the service of God; therefore, the choice should be free, and the capability of the candidate be considered rather than the money. But if, after the election, the elected person, of his freewill, desired to show his gratitude, it should be favourably looked upon by the church." The naïveté of this is as wonderful as its principle, or want of principle. No doubt, the candidates were sounded beforehand as to the precise monetary expression of gratitude which would be forthcoming from them. a short time in the same town together. Referring Heitmann's figure, as the church records show, was

is too good to be passed by. He says :-

"I remember-and, no doubt, many other people remember likewise-that some years ago, a great musician, who since then has, as he deserves, obtained an important appointment as cantor, appeared as organist in a certain town of some size, boldly performed on the largest and finest instruments, and attracted universal admiration by his skill. At the same time, among other inferior players, there offered himself the son of a well-to-do artisan, who could prelude with thalers better than he could with his fingers, and the office fell to him, as may easily be guessed, although everyone was angry about it. It was nigh upon Christmas-tide, and an eloquent preacher, who had not consented to this simony, expounded very beautifully the Gospel concerning the angelic music at the birth of Christ, which, very naturally, gave him the opportunity of expressing his opinions as to the recent event as regarded the rejected artist, and of ending his discourse with this noteworthy epiphonema: He believed quite certainly that if one of the angels of Bethlehem came from heaven, who played divinely, and desired to be organist to St. James's Church, if he had no money he would have nothing to do but to fly away again."

Faithful to the traditions of his family, Bach remained a widower but a little while. We have seen that his father could not do without a "helpmeet" longer than seven months. Sebastian sustained the burden of single life from July, 1720, till the end of the following year. Then he fell a victim to the charms of Anna Magdalena Wulken, daughter of the Court trumpeter at Cöthen. Anna Magdalena was young (twenty-one), and we will politely assume that she was pretty; but the sober father-of-family who married her may have more greatly valued her musical talents, her good soprano voice, and her skill and industry in copying out parts. These were qualities of worth in a musician's wife, and, no doubt, Bach appreciated them. But it is clear that he really loved Anna Magdalena, who, on her side, proved a good and faithful wife, and an affectionate mother of man children. She spent twenty-eight years in wedlock, presenting her husband during that time with six sons and seven daughters. As there were seven children of the master's first marriage, Anna Magdalena might have been forgiven if at any time she played the part of Martha in the house. Spitta points out the curious fact that after each marriage Bach received a legacy. The second, however, involved him in a law affair from which he extricated himself by a manly and straightforward act; openly repudiating all share in measures taken by his coheirs for their mutual benefit.

The year 1723 came, bringing circumstances which sundered Bach and his beloved Prince. "Who is the woman?" was the invariable question of a famous French detective when called upon to investigate a crime. Bach himself may be allowed to tell who was the woman that put an end to his quiet life at Cöthen. In an extant letter, afterwards written at Leipzig, the master said:

"From my youth up my fate has been known to you until the last change, which took me to Cöthen. There lives a gracious Prince who both loves and understands music, and with him I purposed to spend the closing term of my life. However, as it fell out, the above-named Serenissimus married a Princess of Berenburg, and as it then began to appear as though the said Prince's musical inclination was growing

"four thousand marks current," and this sum he Princess seemed to despise my art, it was the will of God that I should be called to be Director Musices here, and Cantor in the Thomasschule.'

Probably, as Spitta suggests, there were deeper reasons than those above stated for Bach's move. The master's instinct could not have been permanently satisfied by the limited range of his musical labours at Cöthen, and his almost complete divorce from the church. As regards chamber music, he was, perhaps, content with what had been done. At any rate, the retrospect was not that of an idle man. Pieces almost innumerable in this department belong to the Cöthen period, but it suffices to mention here the Inventions, Sinfonies, Suites, and the "Welltempered Clavier."

The wonderful Leipzig period now lies before usthe most prolonged, the most illustrious, and, therefore, the most memorable of all. Here it behoves us to enter somewhat more into detail than has hitherto appeared necessary.

Kuhnau was Bach's immediate predecessor as Cantor at the Thomas School. He died June 5, 1722, and six candidates for the post soon appeared in the field. Some of these were old scholars of the foundation, but the one to find most favour was the celebrated Telemann, who had formerly been connected with St. Thomas's Church. A little difficulty arose on the point of teaching a second subject in the School, which Telemann refused to do; but the matter was soon waived by the Council; Telemann was appointed, and wrote from Hamburgh to say that he could not accept the post. Upon this the angry authorities proceeded to make a new choice, and, from several candidates, picked out one Graupner, an old St. Thomas scholar. Graupner was willing enough, but his master, the Grand Duke of Hesse, decidedly was not. His Highness would part with Graupner on no account; so, once more, the Council had to look about them for an eligible person. Bach came forward again. He had been a candidate with Graupner, who was, however, first in the field, and as good as appointed when the Cöthen capellmeister sent in his application. Graupner out of the way, Bach's course was clear, especially as he professed himself willing to do the extra teaching declined by Telemann, and give five Latin lessons per week to the third and fourth classes. In due course his election took place, and he signed a paper solemnly covenanting to lead a respectable life, to be faithful and diligent, to show proper respect and obedience to his superiors, not to make the church music too long or operatic, to instruct the boys and treat them kindly, &c., after the manner of which we have already had example. On May 8, Bach was presented to that august body, the Leipzig Consistory; on the 13th his election was confirmed, and on the 31st he was installed. Very pompous and ponderous, in quaint German fashion, was this last-named ceremony: "At nine in the morning two deputies from the Council proceeded to the Thomasschule, where they were received at the door by the Rector and conducted to the Hall appointed for the examination of the deed. Here they were met by the licentiate preacher at the Church of St. Thomas, who appeared as the representative of Superintendent Deyling, and as the ambassador from the Consistory. The six other masters of the school now joined them, with their new colleague. They took their seats, the pastor and the two reporters of the Council in one row, and opposite to them the school officials according to their rank. The choir first sang a piece of music at the door, and then all the scholars came in. The town clerk made a speech bearing on the installation, and the pastor then pronounced the fact of somewhat lukewarm, and, at the same time, the new installation, adding the customary admonitions and Bach replied in a few words; he was injunctions. congratulated on his new appointment and the ceremony concluded with another musical performance." So did Johann Sebastian Bach enter upon the duties of a post he was destined to make illustrious

BEING AN EXAMINATION OF THE SPIRIT AND TENDENCY OF CERTAIN PHASES IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF MUSICAL FORM

By JOSEPH GODDARD.

POLYPHONY.

THE impulse out of which the beginning of the fugue arose was a melodic impulse. The aim of the descant (known in France and Flanders towards the end of the eleventh century) was the more or less simultaneous enunciation of more than one melody. The pursuit of this aim led easily to the simultaneous enunciation of different portions of the same theme, as exemplified in canon (which appears at the beginning of the twelfth century), and thus set in that line of effort out of which arose ultimately the complex fugal

That the long and laborious pursuit of the fugal art aided in an important degree the development of both harmony and rhythm, and that in the fugue was reached, for the first time, a form of composition standing entirely upon tonal elements, and combining important dimensions with unity of character, are illustrations of the great truth that, in music as in language, principles, both large and small, that is to say, those relating to main configuration as well as those applying to arrangements of detail, arise out of profuse practice and experiment.

If we take a broad survey of the fugue of the middle ages, what structural qualities do we find? First, a certain freedom and variety of conformation, both as regards accent-relation and pitch-relation; secondly, the power of combining the resulting themes into long massive movements. What now is the general influence of this kind of construction upon the musical sense? There are flashes of melodic effect soon lost in the complex thematic enweavement. There is also copious, though incoherent, harmonic effect, the tonal mass being as yet undifferentiated into special harmonic form. We are conscious, then, particularly, of partial melodic effect and vague harmonic effect; and generally, of a long massive flow of tone, which soothes if it does not satisfy the musical passion.

What we have then, so far, in the typical fugue, is an unfolding world of musical forms; but it is as yet an unfinished world. There are melodic and harmonic lineaments passing into and emerging from a body of effect which, though not discordant, has still no clear purport for the art-perceptions. What we have not, is that cumulation of expression—that, so to speak, organic growth of effect-effect toward which every portion of the conformation tends, and to which it is essential-which is the test of finished

Up to this point, then, so far as the original object of the fugal style is concerned—the more or less simultaneous realisation of different melodies-a vast amount of the labour of generations of workers, was failure. Apart from this object, this labour, as we have already said, was advantageous to art, insomuch as it contributed greatly to the development of both harmony and rhythm. It was of further advantage in that it supplied singers and players with considerable and useful matter for perfunctory exercise.

Yet the original impulse which led to the fugue was not only destined to be realised perfectly, but in this realisation some of the higher aspects of musical art were destined to be displayed.

THE DIFFERENTIATION OF HARMONIC FORM: THE TWO FACTORS OF THE HARMONIC SENSATION.

We have seen that the impulse which led to the fugue was a melodic impulse-the desire to enweave one melody with another; and that, out of long activity in this direction, massive polyphonal constructions first arose, involving harmonic effects, but not clearly differentiated harmonic forms. Ultimately, well defined chords appear, and, by the period of Palestrina, are general in composition. As well as being met with in the plain forms of the fugal style peculiar to the above master, they are found at this period applied deliberately both to religious chants and popular tunes.

The first important application of chords appears in the harmonisation of the Psalms of the Protestant Church. Claude Goudimel, the master of Palestrina. harmonised French airs for the Protestant Church in France, whilst the Lutheran choral appeared in Germany. Now, if we examine the general construction of this music, we find that, unlike polyphonal music, the rhythmical march of the parts is identical with that of the melody; and that also the parts of the choral differ further from those of polyphonal music in this-viz., that (with the exception of the leading theme) they have no melodic value individually. But at the same time we shall observe this further-viz., that the simplicity involved in the absence of individual character from these parts, enables the ear to realise clearly such pitch changes as the parts define, simultaneously with the clear realisation of the melody.

We here touch upon one of the two great factors of the harmonic feeling. The side of harmonic effect corresponding with one of these factors may be described as massive change of thematic outlinechange so conformed that the movements of subordinate parts, tend rather to define more strongly than to obscure, the movement of a leading part. That the feeling of harmony is largely a massive feeling of change in pitch-relation, is evidenced to a great extent by the effect of parts in contrary motion. This effect produces the feeling of harmony in peculiar keenness, the reason being, apparently, that as the changes in pitch-relation occur in opposite directions, they are more clearly and easily followed. This factor in the feeling of harmony may be said to be called forth in its perfection when the motions of parts are perceived clearly, yet without effort, and are felt to strengthen the definition of a leading melody. The other great factor in the feeling of harmony, is that vaguer, more occult, yet more diffusive form of sensibility to which the effect of timbre gives rise. The explanation that the sense of quality of tone, or timbre, is due to the compound constitution of single notes, and the corresponding massive nervous excitation, is now familiar to musical students. Now we consider that the feeling due to harmony partakes largely of this kind of sensation, the excitation being a-so to speak-artificial timbre. It is certain that a considerable portion of harmonic effect is calculated to tell only in this way. Take, for instance, the clang of the first chord of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" when given by a full band. Masses of sound such as this, as they follow one another along the outline of a melody, are certainly not analysed completely and consciously by all those whom they impress strongly; in this respect they resemble single tones of rich natural timbre, the mass of partial sounds entering into which tones we know are not analysed consciously. At the same time it is most important to note that although such artificial massive tonal impressure as the chord to which we have referred, is not analysed consciously, it is still the result of ordered harmony. We shall see later on that it is the rôle of ordered harmony to strengthen the coherence and broaden the effect of the thematic outline; that in ordered harmony the chords involve such relations with one another, or with a common harmony, as to have a certain coherence, and that when these chords are attendant upon a theme, the coherence of the chords is added to that of the notes of such theme. Thus the melodic intention is strengthened, that is to say, the melody is impressed more clearly, and the general effect rendered broader and more expressive. The same resultenhancement of melodic outline-accrues to natural timbre. Here, however, there is no ordering of accessory tonal elements by human device; still these elements are ordered, certain principles which have been traced in their ordering being included in harmonic rules-the principles, for instance, governing the amplitude, in relation to pitch, of the constituent Whilst more subtly rich than the harmonic effect of musical art, the tonal environment in the case of natural timbre, is also infinitely more delicate. Combining the utmost complexity with infinite delicacy, it enriches without confusing a pure melodic In harmonised melody the influences of artificial and natural timbre are combined.

Thus the merged factors in the sensation of harmony—(1) clear consciousness of combinative change in pitch-relation; (2) the deeper, vaguer and more diffusive feeling of timbre-influence—have both reference to melody; in both cases the harmonic effect, to be realised fully, demands to be connected with pitch-change.

THE EARLY HARMONIC PERIOD.

We have seen that the definite harmonic combinations which, by the period of Palestrina, had become unfolded in the progress of polyphony, were applied to popular tunes. Thus effects evolved originally by the interweaving of thematic outline became combined anew with thematic outline.

It is here necessary to point out that, although in the Lutheran choral the harmonic departure in musical development is clearly marked—the polyphonal style being quite eliminated—the choral is still an offshoot, having a definite but prescribed form from the main body of ordered sound, which was still animated largely by the polyphonal principle, that is to say, the principle of expression by compound melodic effect. Palestrina continued to write in the fugal style. At the same time the harmonic principle and its developments re-act upon and modify polyphonal music. In Palestrina, definite combinations are taken account of as fixed elements of effect. Although chords evolved from the weft of melody were now combined anew with melody, it is, nevertheless, true that, at this point, the character of the musical impulse was more harmonic than melodic. Palestrina, as we have said, writes with a view to bring about certain definite combinations; and, in the Lutheran choral, the motive would appear to be, more the combining the tune with chords for the sake of the harmony, than with the object of defining the melody: in both cases the producing a construction in the performance of which masses of voices could join with effect adequate to the means, was an important portion of the main end.

This era of Palestrina and the Lutheran choral is a great era in the evolution of harmony. The music was becoming clearer; effects new and grand had become defined, although in their massiveness and crude independence they appeared sombre and austere.

In this stage of musical development there existed that tendency to dwell on harmonic effect as an end in itself, which is now beginning again to betray itself as new harmonic effects are rising into view.

The relation of melody and harmony at this time was such that, though melody by becoming an inherent part of definite harmonic effects, obtained certain new features of expression, these two aspects of the musical picture did not quite coalesce. Whilst the rhythmic march of melody was greatly strengthened, in this strengthening the pitch intention became less pronounced. We may here point out to the general reader that the recognition of pitch-design depends upon the definite impression of a key-note. or central point of the tonal figure—the continuous impression of a key-note being the only fundamental standard of comparison which can give rise to the feeling of symmetry in this region of effect, which are the elements of the melodies most intelligible to Europeans. The notes of the scale preserve clear and fixed relations with one another respectively, through each having a fixed relation to a centre or tonic. Now, it was a peculiarity of the harmonic treatment of melody at the period we are speaking of, to produce a vagueness of feeling as to the key-note, and thus weaken the sense of the pitchintention. Definite harmony, therefore, though it was first discovered in the melodic weft, and afterwards applied under other conditions, to melodic outline, and though it gave to this outline a new and striking environment, only as yet rendered it unmistakably clearer and stronger, in the rhythmic direction.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE DOMINANT SEVENTH .-CLEAR TONALITY.

It was due to the cultivation of dramatic music in the 17th century—in which circumstances the striking both expression and beauty out of melody was a paramount object—that melody and harmony were at length brought into perfect and mutually supporting sympathy, and it was at this period when the fundamental features of modern harmonic effect became first completely unfolded.

The principle of this new development was certainty of tonality, or, in other words, continual clearness in feeling as to the position of the tonic, amidst combinative effect; and the embodiment of this principle hung upon the discovery of the chord of the seventh. The great characteristic of this chord is, it is the only chord which, by itself, proclaims the key it is in; this it does in virtue of containing two notes of the scale, the fourth and seventh, the simultaneous presence of which is only compatible with one scale. Before this chord is used, even if no notes foreign to the scale are employed in the harmony-and it was a peculiarity of the mode of harmonising which prevailed prior to this period, to introduce chromatic alterations in order to make some chords major which the scale gave minor, and vice versa-there was often nothing to decide the actual scale. Sometimes the connection of certain series of notes may have been impressed more strongly, as belonging to this or that scale, by means of accompanying chords, which are salient features of two scales, whilst at other times the general effect of the melody may have defined the scale clearly. But through the use of the chord of the dominant seventh at various and frequent points of the melody, the scale could be feeling of harmony was new, strong, and serious. indubitably proclaimed by presence of its distinctive Musicians had found a new power. The world of notes. In the unfolding, then, of this chord the pitchdesign became immeasurably clearer; and melody, generally, more coherent and effective.

But not only did the use of the chord of the dominant seventh render quite clear the pitch-design as confined to a certain key, but it rendered it possible to extend this design over more keys than one, and still impress a perfectly decided feeling as to tonality. Modulation, it is reasonable to suppose, has existed as long as melody. There seems nothing improbable in an artless singer, whilst improvising a melody, having arrived at a certain note, treating this note as appertaining to a new key-treating, for instance, the fifth of the scale as key-note. The melodic instinct alone might thus lead a singer to modulate effectively. This process, however, demanded a certain lengthimess of effect. In the early application of chords to melody—i.e., before the discovery of the dominant seventh—the process of modulation was not inevitably assisted by the harmony. The clear impression of a new key still demanded the aid of melodic effect, and consequently a process of some length. The chord of the dominant seventh enabled the composer to modulate by aid of the effect of the accompaniment alone, with the utmost clearness and brevity. The passage of this chord to the common chord on the fifth degree below-the effect called the perfect cadence, is the culminating step in the use of this chord for definition of key; at the same time, by the inherent effect of this progression an important power was added to musical art.

THE ART OF ACCOMPANIMENT .- COUNTER-MELODIC EFFECT.

With the use of the chord of the seventh the art of accompaniment arose. By this we mean the accompanying a recitative, song, or duet by sustained chords, broken chords, or chords partly sustained and partly broken, the chord thus serving as harmonic basis not to one note only, but also to a series of notes, of the melody.

When this practice was begun-and it was commenced in the simplest possible form, viz., by placing a continuous bass to a recitative-a point of departure was made which was destined to be of capital impor-

In the harmonisation of the choral all the parts have the same rhythmic march. But in the new form of combinative music which resulted from the discovery of the art of accompaniment, rhythmic variety, and consequent thematic freedom limits defined by the harmony became possible in subordinate parts without detriment to the theme in the capacity of leading effect. In polyphonal music thematic freedom in subordinate parts existed to the verge of license; in the Lutheran choral it disappeared completely. In the new order of combinative effect it emerged again to play its part in a clearer atmosphere under clearer laws. Whilst the art of accompaniment in the rudimentary forms to which we have referred, that is to say, in sustained or broken chords, was, and is still, appropriate for attending certain kinds of effect, there grew, side by side with it, an enrichment of it-produced by the entering into it of the old polyphonal tendency toward compound thematic effect-viz., true melodic outline subordinate to the leading theme, yet not merely involving generally consonant effect, as in polyphonal music, but harmonically homogeneous with the rest of the structure, and involving definite harmonic progressions. This we term counter-melodic effect.

This ultimate issue of the point of departure made by the art of accompaniment, is a principle of conmodern music in every direction mainly depend, been drilled upon close as well as open vowels Before, however, it could speak as it does in the connected with consonants." This "voice from symphonies of Beethoven, or the dramas of Wagner, the art generally had to pass through a further probation.

Throughout this survey, so far, we see that the theme or melodic outline is the unit and animating principle of the musical structure. In the endeavour to enunciate more than one theme simultaneously, arose polyphonal effect, which, in the form of the fugue, betrays, for the first time a musical structure that can stand, if need be, independently of literary accessory. In the practice of the fugue, fundamental elements of harmonic effect in the form of chords were discovered. These, the residuum of polyphony, were applied in a special way to display melody in the form of the Choral, and, notwithstanding they gave breadth and a certain vague grandeur to the theme, they often tended rather to obscure than to display the melodic intention, because their march did not always conspire with that of the notes of the melody to uphold, for the time being, a single standard of symmetry in the form of the key-note; and the theme was only strengthened unequivocally on the rhythmic side. By the discovery of the chord of the Dominant 7th, theme and its harmonic environment were brought at length into mutually supporting combination. By aid of the art of accompaniment it became possible to display the melodic outline in this combination with peculiar distinctness, as in recitative, air, duet, and concerted music. This famous invention opened the way for the development of dramatic music, which up to this point could only attempt to articulate in the diffuse archaic accents of fugue and canon. The art of accompaniment admitted further a new exercise of the polyphonal impulse. Counter-melodic effect arose. Rhythmic independence in subordinate parts, carried to the extreme in polyphony and lost entirely in the choral type of effect, returned. Thus true melodic outline subordinate to a leading theme—a principle of construction which pervades the larger works of the modern period—became possible.

WE read the following in an American Musical journal: "The numerous musical programmes which have been presented at the commencement exercises of the various colleges, conservatories, music schools and recitals during the past few weeks have suggested a question to the mind which it may not be out of place to ask: 'Why is the English language excluded from vocal music as a study?' Italian seems to have a preference, with an equal division in German and French for second choice, but English is considered beneath a passing notice." This question might well have been asked some few years ago in England, but all who feel interest in the subject must be aware that songs originally composed in the language of our country are now much more frequently sung both in public and private than they were. But, after all, English songs are not all that we want. What we desire is an "English school of singing," so that composers may know that their works may be not only correctly, but sympathetically rendered, a result which can never be arrived at where pupils are taught to sing either foreign words translated into English or the vapid verses of "Royalty" ballads. As it is truly said in the article from which we have already extracted, "Vocal instruction should commence with tone production and breath control, enunciation following next in order. As a matter of fact, the tone production is much assisted by correct pronunstruction upon which the highest developments of ciation; and no pupil is correctly taught who has not America" so thoroughly represents our own convictions upon the subject that we are bound to listen to It is of no use urging composers to write music to English words unless we can create a race of English vocalists to sing them.

THOSE who dwell not close to a railway, where the shrill sound of the whistle is heard night and day, sometimes uttering merely a piercing and prolonged shriek, and sometimes imitating, as accurately as can be expected by a single note, the crowing of a cock, can scarcely imagine the horrible effects of this instrument of torture upon a sensitive nature. Possibly persons with educated musical ears may feel a more acute shock than that experienced by others condemned to this infliction; and in deference, perhaps, to the rapid spread of the art amongst the people, some benevolently inclined individual has, we hear, recently patented an invention by which railway signals shall be transmitted by musical sounds, through pipes or reeds worked by means of steam or compressed air. Until a more definite description appears of this proposed system we are left somewhat in doubt whether the remedy will not be worse than the disease; for if well-tuned organ pipes are to be substituted for the monotonous whistle, the attention will be attracted in spite of ourselves, and we shall be constantly trying to discover whether the musical phrase forced upon our ear means "Train on line," "Shunt for the express," "Go on, with caution," or any other of the numerous messages necessary to secure the safety of passengers. Again, we would desire to know whether this musical language-one false note in which might wreck a train is to be spoken by ordinary signalmen, or by regularly trained practitioners in this department of the art. Surely our lives are not to be placed in jeopardy through the ignorance of one who, warned of danger by a discord, mistakes it for a concord. Of course the matter is in embryo at present; but should the method we have described come into operation, certainly a "Musical Railway Signal Academy" must be at once instituted.

An article in a recent number of the Spectator very ably debates the question of musical pitch, attention to which has again been drawn by the meeting held at St. James's Hall. The author truly says that " very little remains to be added to the arguments in favour of or against a lowering of pitch which have been stated at previous crises in the controversy," This is an undeniable fact; but we are quite certain, from recent experience, that whenever the subject is publicly discussed these very arguments will be brought forward as if they had never been heard The writer of the article to which we have alluded especially reminds his readers of the series of Oratorio Concerts organised by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. in 1869, in which the diapason normal was adopted, a new organ being tuned to this pitch, the necessary wind instruments being purchased in Paris, and the services of Mr. Barnby being secured as Conductor. Whatever relief may have been experienced by the vocalists from this change, it soon became evident that the public cared but little about it; and as there existed no means by which this, or indeed any other, uniform pitch could be enforced, but little more was heard of the matter. Lately, however, it has been seen that the subject is not one which can be allowed to drop; but as we have said, the meeting called to consider it only elicited a repetition of the opinions expressed in 1860 at the Society of Arts; and although a Committee was formed, we fear that, if from no other cause, to "Mors et Vita," and, for the purpose now in view, we the practical objection of the expense involved in the construction of new wind instruments will materially retard the settlement of this much vexed question. The fact is that vocalists-who are undoubtedly most interested in lowering the pitch-should continue to agitate the subject until some satisfactory solution of the difficulty has been arrived at; but whilst our most prominent Conductors hold themselves aloof from the discussion, we can advance but slowly. Surely they must entertain some definite opinions on such an important matter; and we shall be glad indeed, therefore, if they will no longer remain silent.

WE have often been pressed to say a few words in favour of the concertina; and without committing ourselves to the assertion of its right to take a place amongst our universally accepted musical instruments, we cannot but admit that it is something more than a toy. In Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" we are told that "the compass of the treble concertina is four octaves, through which it has a complete chromatic scale. Much variety of tone can be obtained by a skilful player, and it has the power of being played with great expression and complete sostenuto and staccato. Violin, flute, and oboe music can be performed on it without alteration: but music written specially for the concertina cannot be played on any other instrument, except the organ or harmonium." In addition to the treble concertina there are tenor, bass, and double-bass instruments, fully capable of taking these parts in concerted music the entire range thus embracing 65 octaves. Of course, if the music performed on the concertina were necessarily limited to "arrangements," it could scarcely be hoped that the instrument would awaken much interest amongst cultivated musicians; but when we find that the compositions especially written for it include (according to the article already quoted from) "2 concertos, in G and D, for solo concertina and orchestra, by Molique; 2 ditto, ditto, in D and E flat, by G. Regondi; sonata for piano and concertina, in B flat, by Molique; quintet for concertina and strings, by G. A. Macfarren; adagio for 8 concertinas, in E, by E. Silas; quintet in D, for piano, concertina, violin, viola, and cello, by the same; and 6 trios, for piano, concertina, and violin, by the same, we may reasonably imagine that a vehicle chosen for the expression of the thoughts of such composers must be worth more attention than has hitherto been given to it. As we happen to know, too, that an application has recently been made to admit the concertina amongst the subjects for one of our highest-class examinations, the matter assuredly demands at least some serious consideration.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

THE purpose of this article is description not criticism. It will deal with facts; not with opinions that may hereafter be founded upon them

Eight novelties, more or less important, will be produced at the Birmingham Festival, which opens on the 25th of this instant month. They are "Mors et Vita," an Oratorio, by M. Gounod; "The Spectre's Bride," a Cantata, by Mr. by M. Goulous, "The Spectre's Bride, a Cantacta, by Mit. Antonin Dvorák; "The Three Holy Children," an Oratorio, by C. Villiers Stanford; "Yule-Tide," a Cantata, by Thomas Anderton; "Rock of Ages," a Hymn, by J. F. Bridge; a Symphony in F, by Ebenezer Prout; a Violin Concerto. by A. C. Mackenzie, and the "Sleeping Beauty," a Cantata, by F. H. Cowen. Of these eight, six, it will be observed, are by English composers-a fact upon which, as speaking well for native art, and as reflecting credit upon the Festival Committee, it is needless to comment.

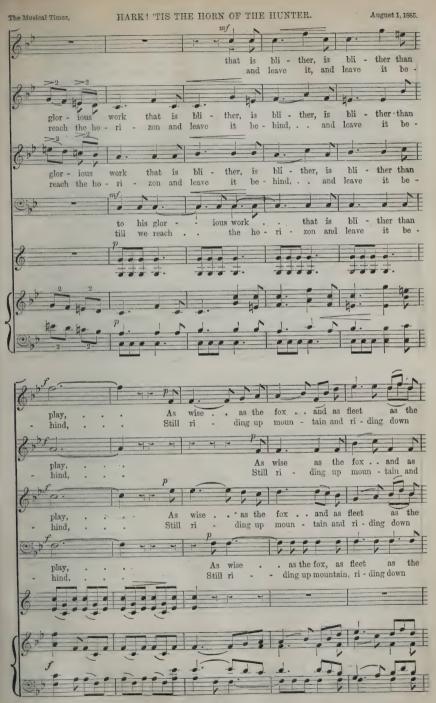

A FOUR-PART SONG.

Composed by A. C. MACKENZIE.

* The notes between the asterisks only to be sung when the piece is performed without Horns.

cannot do better than produce it here. The eminent composer says:

"This work is the continuation of my sacred trilogy 'The Redemption.' It will perhaps be asked why, in the title, I have placed death before life, although in the order of temporal things life precedes death. Death is only the end of that existence which dies each day; it is only the end of that existence which these each day; it is only the end of a continual 'dying.' But it is the first moment, and, as it were, the birth of that which dies no more. I cannot here enter into a detailed analysis of the different musical forms which express the meaning and idea of this work. I do not wish to expose myself to the reproach either of pretension or subtlety. I shall therefore confine myself to pointing out the essential features of the ideas I have wished to express; that is to say, the tears which death causes us to shed here below; the hope of a better life; the solemn dread of unerring Justice; the tender and filial trust in eternal Love. Among those musical forms of which the reiteration through the work is most to be noticed, I shall call special attention to the following:-

which expresses the terror inspired by the sense of the inflexibility of Justice, and, in consequence, by that of the anguish of punishment. This melodic form, which is employed both in ascending and descending order, presents a sequence of three major seconds. Its sternness gives expression both to the sentences of Divine Justice, and the sufferings of the condemned, and is found in combination throughout the whole work with melodic forms which express sentiments altogether different, as in the "Sanctus" and the "Pie Jesu," in the Requiem, which forms the first nart-

"This second melodic form, that of sorrow and tears, is transformed, by the use of the major key, and the alteration of a single note, into the expression of consolation and joy-expresses the happiness of the blessed.

Lastly, the following melodic form, which, by means of threefold superposition, results in the interval of an augmented fifth, announces the awakening of the dead at the terrifying call of the angelic trumpets, of which St. Paul speaks in one of his Epistles to the Corinthians "-

Not a word need be added to the foregoing as respects the "representative themes" which make up so prominent a feature of the Oratorio. The structure of the book may be briefly described. The first part, entitled "Mors, be briefly described. The first part, entitled "Mors," opens with a Prologue, which brings together the texts "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," and "I am the Resurrection and the Life," &c.; thus indicating the subjects—Death and Life—forming the main body of the "argument." Then follows a setting of the "Requiem," and of two auxiliary texts, introduced by way of comment. This, of course, fills up a very large expects and makes the first Part with the Prologue and large space, and makes the first Part, with its Prologue and orchestral Epilogue, by far the most important of the three into which the book is divided. The second part-" Judicium "-leads off with an orchestral Adagio, Sleep of the Dead," and continues with another instrumental movement, "The Trumpets at the Last Judgment," which is followed by a third, ending with a recitative, and called "The Resurrection of the Dead." Next comes a section entitled "The Judge," partly orchestral, partly choral; after which the "Judgment of the Elect" and the "Judgment of the Rejected" are dealt with, the words used being chiefly those of the Gospel, beginning "When the Son of man shall come in His glory," The third part "Vita"-contains texts referring to the new heaven and the new earth, the heavenly Jerusalem, the worship of the heavenly Host, and the blessedness of the Redeemed, the whole ending with "Hosanna in excelsis." In this case, as may be supposed, the Apocalypse has been drawn upon for suitable words. The large scope of the book is at once apparent. It covers as much ground as the book of "The Redemption," and supplies equal variety and contrast of subject. Of the music we may say, generally, that it bears the stamp of authorship on every page. The composer strikes out no new line. He is simply his old self, and this is, perhaps, as his admirers would have him be. It follows that the orchestration supplies an important feature, and is richly coloured. To this end extensive means are employed; the more descriptive numbers requiring six trumpets, six horns, an extra tuba, an extra trombone, harps, and the whole family of percussion instruments. The solos though perhaps not so numerous as in "The Redempare relatively more important, because more melodic. Various forms are used - air, duet, quartet, for example - but there are also declamatory passages, on ample—but there are also decuments, passages, the model of those that occur so frequently in the earlier work. The choral music may be divided into two corresponding classes. Much of it trusts for two corresponding classes. Much of it trusts for effect to harmony rather than melody or counterpoint, and is carried on in a quasi-declamatory style. On the other hand, there are choruses in which melody predominates, while two are to some extent fugal, and one, a double chorus, is written in the manner of the early church composers. Both in the instrumental and vocal departments large use is made of the "representative themes" cited in M. Gounod's preface. They are never absent long together, and form a much more conspicuous feature than the same device in other works from M. Gounod's pen. It may be added that the composer here outdoes himself in the freedom of his harmonic treatment, and in the liberal use he makes of sequences, which, as a matter of fact, take up no small part of the oratorio. Generally speaking, it is clear that he has lavished upon "Mors et Vita" all the wealth of his peculiar resources.

Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride" is founded upon a Bohemian legend, but one by no means exclusively Bohemian property, since it belongs, in some form or other, to several European nations. Bürger has treated it in his famous ballad "Lenore"—the "poetic basis" of Raff's well-known symphony-and students of Scottish well-known symptony—and stated the dead lover, william, came to fetch his bride, Margaret. It need scarcely be said that the Bohemian version has some features peculiar to itself. Thus the heroine sins by praying to the Virgin for the restoration of her absent lover in terms of almost rebellious impatience-

Bring him again, thus do I pray, Else carry me to him away.

Her petition is answered in terrible form. The lover appears, to take her to the home he has provided, drags her at headlong pace over a frightful road, commands her to throw away, one by one, all the sacred emblems she wears, and finally arrives at a church, which he declares to be his castle. He wishes her to jump with him over the churchyard wall; but she bids him lead the way. No sooner has he done so, than the affrighted maiden rushes off, and takes shelter in a hut, where lies the dead body of a man. The lover's voice is presently heard without, calling upon the corpse to rise and unbar the door. The dead hears, and is about to obey, when a cock crows, and the power of hell becomes impotent for evil. This ghastly story is told in narrative form, and Dvorák has, of course, had to divide it, for musical purposes, in an arbitrary fashion. The music, however, is instinct with dramatic force and vigour. Only the ordinary orchestra is used, and nowhere does it take from the voices the prominence justly belonging to them. A special feature of the work is its lavish use of solo and chorus in such a manner as that the latter echoes the phrases of the former. There is, perhaps, something too much of this, but experience will show, and it is unfair to anticipate. The solo voices employed are a soprano (the maiden), a tenor (the lover), and a bass, which divides the narrative portions with the chorus. Dvorák has written throughout in a free style, and by no means easily, either for voices or instruments. In other respects the Cantata bears the impress of his well-marked

The book of Mr. Stanford's "Three Holy Children" is not a conventional one, and in its departure from usage, is clever and effective. Its first part presents a dramatised form of Psalm 138, "By the waters of Babylon." "Some Assyrian soldiers, on their way to obey his (the King's) summons, come upon a company of Jewish women, seated by the river Euphrates, who are mourning over the captivity of their race. Taunted by their captors, the women reply by songs of praise for their lost country, and imprecations on their enemies. They are comforted by a prophecy of their return from captivity." Thus the situation is authoritatively stated, and the idea is very well carried out, with no deviation from the exact text of Scripture, and with little addition to Psalm 138. Subsequently the scene on the plain of Dura is set forth; partly in dramatic form, partly with the aid of narrative. Here selections are given from the Psalms, and from authentic Assyrian inscriptions, as well as from Daniel and the song of the three children. For a choral finale, extracts are used from the song just named, and the Psalm 148, "O all ye works of the Lord." The general result is a book having dramatic interest, yet abounding in lyrical expression. It presents, in short, a happy combination, obtained apart from the smallest liberty with Scripture. In the construction of his music, Dr. Stanford largely avails himself of representative themes, without which, apparently, no modern work is considered complete. These are somewhat elaborately interwoven into the musical texture, and it seems vain to hope a first or even a second hearing will suffice for complete recognition. The chief of them, however, are to be identified with sufficient ease. Unusual clearness distinguishes the airs and choruses. It would appear, indeed, as though Mr. Stanford had, for the time being, shaken himself out of thraldom to modern Germany, with its involved and complicated utterances. Thus the grand final chorus, "O all ye works of the Lord," is almost Handelian in its breadth of effect and simplicity of outline. On this account, and others of a like sort, it is hardly rash to say that popularity awaits the "Three Holy Children." By the way, it is curious that Mr. Stanford, like M. Gounod, has composed a number in the style of Palestrina. But of other resemblance between the two efforts there is absolutely none.

In the case of Mr. Anderton's Cantata "Yule Tide" we cannot do better than quote the preface, which gives a clear idea of the book :-

"In this Cantata there is no developed dramatic design or continuous story. The idea of the work is a gathering of kindred and friends on Christmas eve (such as is common in many countries), at which stories are told and adventures related. The Cantata opens with a prologue, outside) singing a Christmas Carol. This is followed by an Introductory Festive Christmas Chorus, after which the Sailor gives his story of "Christmas Eve at Sea," and the little child tells her "Dream of the Christ-Child." Shortly afterwards the company, as represented by the chorus, call for a ghost story, and, in response to this appeal, the weird Icelandic story of Gudrun and her ride through the night with her spectre lover is told. legend (known in various forms in different countries) is, as narrated in this Cantata, supposed to be followed with vivid interest by the chorus, who in imagination realise the incidents of the story, and by their interpolations give a certain dramatic colouring to this part of the Cantata. A vocal quintet which shortly follows, and for which Shakespeare's words-are used, leads on to an instrumental Intermezzo, which is intended to suggest the close approach of the holy Christmas Morn, and which movement, if not too presumptuous, might perhaps take for its text and title: "The time draws near the birth of Christ." This Intermezzo quietly merges into the following soprano solo, with chorus, "Hush, our Christmas Eve is ending"; and a quartet and chorus, "Gloria in Excelsis," brings the Cantata to a close.'

Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated, &c.

The foregoing "argument" has been dealt with in verse by Julia Goddard with considerable success, both as regards power of expression and the providing of opportunities for musical effect. Mr. Anderton's music is contained in sixteen numbers, including solos for tenor (the Sailor), soprano (the Child), contralto (the Teller of the Gudrun Legend), and bass. The choruses are relatively numerous and important, and the whole is written in the manly straightforward fashion which appeals to popular English taste. Obviously, the interest of the work is cumulative, an excellent finale being supplied by the Christmas music, including a "Gloria in excelsis," for quartet and chorus combined.

Dr. Bridge's Hymn, "Jesus, pro me perforatus," is dedicated to Mr. Gladstone, the author of the Latin text,

"Augustus Montague Toplady, author of the well-known hymn 'Rock of Ages,' and other poems, was born at Farnham, in Surrey, in the year 1740, and was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Dublin. He held the livings successively of Blagdon, Somerset, and Broad Hembury, Devon, from which he removed to London in 1775, to become chief minister of the Calvinistic Chapel, Orange Street. He died in the year 1778, and is chiefly memorable in Church History for his strenuous opposition to John Wesley and the movement he originated. hymn first appeared in the Gospel Magazine for March, nymn first appeared in the Gospel Magasine in Mackin, 1776, where it is entitled 'A living and dying prayer for the holiest believer in the world.' The Latin version, 'Jesus, pro me perforatus,' written 1848, appeared in the joint volume of translations published in 1861 by Mr. Gladstone and the late Lord Lyttelton. The music was written for this version only, but the setting adapts itself fairly well to the English original, the sentiment and the sense of which Mr. Gladstone so closely follows,'

The four six-line verses are treated in the form of a chorus, with interspersed baritone solo. As the full score is not before us, we can say nothing regarding the orchestration, but the pianoforte score indicates that it is an important feature in the ensemble. Contrapuntal effects are not aimed at till the last verse is reached, and we may note that here the composer makes an unexpected point by treating the lines, "Dum hos artus vita regit, Quando nox sepulchro tegit" ("While I draw this fleeting breath, When mine eyelids close in death"), as presenting a marked contrast demanding, in the one case, vigour, in the other, solemnity.

At the time of writing no particulars of Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" are available; we pass, therefore, to the Symphony of Mr. Prout and the Violin Concerto of Mr. Mackenzie. The first-named work is in F major, and contains the usual four movements, which are written throughout in classic form and style, the ordinary orchestra throughout in classic form and style, the ordinary orchestra being employed. The first movement, preluded by an Introduction (Sostenuto assai), is an Allegro eon brio; the second movement, in B flat, is marked Larghetto espressivo; the third (Poco allegretto, quasi Andantius) is an Intermezzo à l'Espagnol, in D minor; while the finale appears as an Allegro vivace e con fuoco. Not a single one of these movements departs from the model which has come down to us with the sanction of the great masters.

Mr. Mackenzie's Concerto opens with an Allegro non troppo in C sharp minor, continues with a Largo in A major, and ends with an Allegro vivace in E major. Like all previous works from the same pen, it has distinctive features, but these can hardly be discussed without trenching upon matters of opinion. We will only express an anticipation that the Largo will be found especially interesting alike through its structure and subject.

Our task is now ended, and our readers probably agree with us that the approaching Festival is certain to prove one of moment for music in general, English music in

CHESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL. (BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE third triennial celebration of this Festival since its revival in 1879-after an interregnum of fifty years-took place on the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th ult., and proved to be in all respects a gratifying success, reflecting the utmost credit upon the Rev. Precentor Hylton Stewart and Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, who, as secretary and conductor respectively, did most of the work. Much local support, in one form at all events, was extended to the Festival. Its Presidents included the Duke of Westminster and several other county magnates; a host of ladies and gentlemen figured among the vice-presidents, while the Church, represented by Dean Howson, and the municipality in the person of the Mayor, acted upon the Executive Committee. was well, but I fear that in many cases the Festival had reason to ask complainingly: "What's in a name"? His Grace of Westminster behaved nobly; entertaining a party at Eaton Hall and bringing them in each day for the performances; but the example was not generally followed; nor did the townspeople perform their duty in this regard. The pecuniary success achieved was largely due to strangers, attracted by musical doings in the cathedral church of a city itself the worthy object of countless pilgrimages.

In point of executive resources the Festival was well supplied. There was a fairly numerous and tolerably efficient orchestra, comprising many members of Mr. C. Halle's band; the chorus comprised 120 Cestrian singers; seventy from Bradford, and about as many from Manchester, the three contingents making up an excellent body of voices; while, as principal vocalists, the Committee engaged Miss Mary Davies, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley-all native artists be it observed. Herr Straus played the leading violin; the organ was entrusted to Mr. J. T. Hughes, and Dr. Joseph C. Bridge, as Cathedral Organist, had the supreme direction.

The programme of the first Cathedral performance contained Gounod's "Redemption," which, like all the other sacred works, figured as part of a Service of Prayer and Praise, authorised for the occasion. In this case, the solos were taken by Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, the last three being those who "created" their respective parts at Birmingham in 1882. Under such circumstances it is not surprising that the congregation was a large one, or that the most profound attention was paid to music nowhere heard to so full advantage save in a cathedral. The rendering of Gounod's work gave general satisfaction. It might have been better certainly, but no less assuredly it was good enough for appro-bation. All the artists above named acquitted themselves well; the orchestra did better than in any subsequent work, and the structure of the building favoured to the fullest extent the special effects intended by the composer when During the chorus he introduced the Celestial Choir. "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," the harps, trumpets and voices of this choir were stationed high up in the tower gallery, whence their music descended with a strikingly realistic result. The conducting of Dr. Joseph C. Bridge thus early set any doubts at rest. It was clear, purposeful, and correct, while free from the pretence which many wielders of the bâton think they ought to make.

On the following morning, when there was again a large attendance, the programme included several works, small in dimensions, but unquestionable in point of merit. At the head of them stood Bach's Motett for eight voices, "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks." This composition, as amateurs well know, is unaccompanied. It served, therefore, to test the chorus, and display what qualities were in them. The ordeal was passed safely, no fault, save a slight drop in pitch, being observable; while the fugal movements were given with a steadiness and sustained power highly commendable. Next followed Handel's Concerto in D minor, for organ and orchestra—the one not long before played at the Handel Commemoration in Westminster Abbey by Dr. J. Frederick Bridge, who was the executant on this occasion. The Concerto is chiefly remarkable for an introductory Adagio resembling in some points of form the first Allegro of a modern work, but chiefly made striking by the novel use of three solo violoncellos, two of which have their parts doubled by a bassoon. This movement, very dignified in its expression, is also very beautiful, and should not again be lost

The ductor, as his exercise for the degree of Mus. Doc. libretto of this work deals, in narrative form, with the subject of the dream which Nebuchadnezzar dreamed and forgot, which his soothsayers could not relate, but which Daniel, to the glory of his God, brought back to the mind of the King. Connected with the texts in which the story is told, are others of a reflective nature, the book offering no new features whatever for public criticism. Musically the work is also built upon accustomed lines; the narrative being told by the solo soprano and contralto; the tenor having Daniel's part, and the bass that of the King, while the men of the chorus act as the Magicians. shall not describe the music in detail, since every useful snall not describe the music in detail, since every discinimation purpose will be served by indicating where the composer's strength and weakness lie; the more because Dr. J. C. Bridge gives promise of doing good work in years to come. Speaking broadly, the chief merits of "Daniel" are found in the dramatic and descriptive numbers. The composer has a considerable faculty of imagination, and the power of placing situations and scenes before the eye by means of his art; this also implies facility and skill in orchestration—qualities which "Daniel" conspicuously displays. The result is that in the music connected with the Dream, with the Magicians and with the King, it is easy to recognise a very promising degree of strength. On the other hand, the lyrical numbers and those into which neither description nor action enters, are comparatively weak. In these cases the composer's faculty of invention does not shine. He even uses phrases of the most commonplace character. Experience will, doubtless, serve to amend this fault as regards future works, and, even as "Daniel" stands, merit so far outweighs defects as to place the composer among "coming men." The new oratorio was ably performed and well received; the solos being entrusted to Miss Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley, at whose hands they received all needful justice. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," solos by Miss Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Brereton, closed the performance.

On the last day of the Festival there were two Services in the Cathedral, the first being devoted to "St. Paul," the second to "The Messiah." The attendance at "St. Paul" was not very numerous, but the beautiful work, fairly well interpreted, made a deep impression, and, I venture to say, will be more welcome when next presented. Its airs received admirable illustration from Miss Mary Davies (whose delicate talent shone conspicuously), from Miss Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The chorus discharged their duty well, but the band, who seemed little acquainted with the music, left much to desire. Concerning the performance of "The Messiah," it is needless to speak more than is required for record of Mr. Maas' superb singing in the Passion music. The attendance on this occasion was very large.

A few words must suffice for the two secular Concerts given in the Music Hall. In the programme of the first were the "Pastoral" Symphony; a selection from Mr. Hecht's clever Cantata, "Eric the Dane," and a pretty new Minuet and Trio, by Sir Herbert Oakeley, as well as some songs and two overtures. The second was taken up by Berlioz's "Faust," which excited a remarkable degree of interest, the hall being crowded, and had a capital rendering, with Miss Davies, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as soloists. On the whole, the Chester Festival was, as I have said, a gratifying success, and one honourable to those who assumed responsibility in connection with it. May it prove the forerunner of many others even more satisfactory.

HISTORIC CONCERTS AT THE INVENTIONS EXHIBITION.

THE errors and omissions of the executive of the International Inventions Exhibition with regard to the nature and quality of the musical performances provided for the entertainment of visitors have been commented upon in severe terms, not only in our own columns, but in the ordinary press. To have continued fault-finding would have been sight of. Dr. J. F. Bridge played the solo with conspicuous unpleasant and monotonous, though we should not have sight of. Dr. J. F. Bridge played the solo with conspicuous unpleasant and monotonous, though we should not have supplied in the solo with th the past month, and we note its appearance with pleasure. The series of Concerts illustrative of the early history of music have awakened a considerable amount of interest, not only amongst musicians, but the general public. Doubtless a large majority of those who attended were actuated by no better feeling than idle curiosity, taking the Historic Concert simply as one of the items in the day's programme. But it was obvious that the listeners became interested as the performances proceeded, the applause invariably increasing to the very end. It must ever be so in the art of music. We have only to scatter seed broad-cast, and though some of it will fall on stony ground and perish, some will also take root and bear fruit a hundred-fold.

Taking the Concerts in the order they were given, we have first to speak of those undertaken by members and professors of the Brussels Conservatoire on the 1st, 2nd, and 4th ult. These consisted of performances of old music on obsolete instruments, in the manipulation of which the performers showed a large amount of skill, which, however, is not surprising, considering the magnificent collection of such instruments possessed by the Conservatoire. From the point of view of abstract musical effect, the efforts of the players of course varied greatly. 'Some of the effects were beautiful as well as curious, while others were only curious. In the latter category must be placed the sounds produced by the eight flauti dolci in a Sinfonia Pastorale from "Eurydice," by Jacopo Peri, a composer generally considered the originator of opera. The flauti dolci are flutes à bec of various lengths, the lowest or bass flute extending downwards to-

These instruments, with sometimes the addition of a drum, formed the band of the Lansquenets of the 16th century. The pupils of M. Dumon's class handled them well, but the effect resembled a description of street organ now happily but rarely heard. To finish with the flutes, M. J. Dumon played some pieces by Bach, Handel, and Quantz, music master to Frederick the Great, on a singlekeyed ivory instrument, the tone of which was very soft and pure. Yet more pleasing were the performances on the viola da gamba, by M. E. Jacobs. The viola da gamba was, as most of our readers are doubtless aware, one of the larger instruments of the viol family, having six or seven strings, the lowest being D below the staff, and a fretted finger-board. As its name implies, it was played like the violoncello, the tone of which it resembles. The instrument used on this occasion was a beautiful example by an unknown maker of the 17th century, and it was played to perfection by M. Jacobs. Of the keyed instruments, the oldest exhibited was a regal of the 15th century, a curious kind of chamber organ, with one set of reed pipes. The blower faces the player at the other end of the instrument, which is between three and four feet long, and merely raises the bellows, which then slowly fall by their own weight.

The harpsichord performers were Mdlle, Ulmann and M. A. Wouters, the instrument being one with a double keyboard, by Hieronymus Albert Hass, 1734. Vocal solos by Guillaume de Machault (circe 1350), Rameau, Bach, &c., were neatly rendered by Mdlle. Elly Warnots, the accompaniments being, of course, played upon some of the above-mentioned instruments. It should be added that the Concerts were organised and directed by M. Victor Mahillon, Director of the Museum of the Brussels Conservatoire, and that the performers appeared by permission of M. F. A. Gevaert, Principal of the Conservatoire. These Concerts, which were wisely given in the Music Room, attracted much attention from visitors to the Exhibition, a crowd of persons being unable to obtain admission on each occasion.

Even more interesting and certainly more enjoyable as a musical performance was the Concert given by the Bristol Madrigal Society, in the Albert Hall, on the 8th ult. Some of the audience were heard to express surprise that it was necessary to send to Bristol for a body of singers capable of rendering justice to a class of music in which perhaps more than any other this country has excelled. We admit that there was ample ground for this feeling, but however humiliating it may be to the metropolis, we ment of the choristers from the western city, for although there are madrigal societies in London, they carry on their operations in strict privacy, and our ordinary choral societies only pay partial attention to this department of vocal art. In justice to Bristol, which has been rather severely dealt with in respect of its want of appreciation of classical music, and the conduct of its recurring festivals, it may be said that it takes the lead in cultivation of English unaccompanied music, for in addition to the Madrigal Society it boasts the Orpheus Glee Union, which has done much to keep alive a form of art peculiarly national, and of late years somewhat neglected. Both of these bodies consist wholly of male voices, the treble parts in the former being supplied by boys. Once every year there is a ladies' night, when the Society is strengthened by picked members from the Cathedral choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, Hereford, Oxford, &c., and it was this combined force which took part in the Albert Hall Concert. According to the time-honoured custom, the singers maintained a sitting posture during the performance, the music-books being laid on desks before them. The programme contained the very finest examples of the Elizabethan writers, including Wilbye's "Lady, when I behold," and "Sweet Honeysucking Bees," Weelkes's "As Vesta was" and "The Nightingale," Gibbons's "The Silver Swan," and Edwards's "In going to my lonely bed," with the choicest compositions of the best of modern madrigalian writers, R. L. Pearsall, namely, "Lay a Garland," "In Dulci Jubilo," and "Sir Patrick Spens." The delight of the audience was expressed by loud applause and numerous encores, and we fancy that a series of performances of encores, and we fancy that a series of performances of this nature by a well-trained body of executants, such, for example, as Mr. Leslie's choir, would meet with cordial appreciation in London. If it is necessary to be critical we may say that the trebles were a trife weak, and that in one or two items the singing was somewhat cold and expressionless, though in the matters of unity of method, correct intonation, and quality of tone there was nothing left to desire. The name of the Conductor was, oddly enough, not stated in the programme, but we believe it was Mr. D. Rootham, who succeeded Mr. Corfe in 1864.

The next Concert took place on the 14th ult., and consisted of sacred music by Italian and English composers of the 16th and 17th centuries, interpreted by a small choir under the direction of Mr. W. S. Rockstro. In the space of an hour it was obviously impossible to range fully over the ground indicated, but the selection was fairly good save that the greatest of all English composers of the period, Henry Purcell, was unrepresented. The only other point open to objection was the addition of the Abbellimenti or ornamental passages in Allegri's celebrated Miserere, as these date from a much later period than the original composition. We have fully dealt with this subject in another column. The programme included Palestrina's Missa Brevis, first printed in 1570 in the composer's third Book of Masses, and unaccompanied anthems by John Redford, Tallis, Farrant, and Gibbons. The last-named composer was made to appear as a centenarian, the dates of his birth and death being given as 1583 and 1685. The latter should have been 1625.

We now come to the most important Concerts of the series, namely, the three performances of ancient Netherlandish music by Mr. Daniel de Lange's choir of Amsterdam vocalists, whose names were given in our last number. was a great pity these Concerts were not given in the Music Room instead of the Albert Hall. Not only was much of the proper effect of the music lost in the vast rotunda, but the continual entrances and exits of visitors were distracting alike to eye and ear. Another blunder was made in announcing the Concerts to take place at 5 p.m., and at the last moment altering the time to 3 o'clock, causing many musicians to make a fruitless journey to South Kensington. It is necessary to mention these matters if only to show how easy it is for those unused to Concert giving to fall into grievous errors over matters of detail. In spite of these disadvantages, however, the Dutch artists had no reason to feel dissatisfied with their reception as interpreters of the music of their country in remote ages. In Holland, as elsewhere, there has of late cannot deny that the Council were justified in the engage- years been a revival of interest in archaic musical art, and landish songs, &c., being part of a series of reprints of the works of Obrecht, Sweelinck, Schuyt, and other old masters of the 16th and 17th centuries. Selections from these were included in the programmes of the Concerts. The oldest master represented was, of course, Willem Dufay (1360-1432), who is, by general consent, regarded as the founder of the Flemish school, and the inventor of canon. Parenthetically we may say that the dates here given are taken from the programmes, but the dates here given are taken from the programmes, our some of them are disputed or at least uncertain. The interest of Dufay's music is, of course, purely historical. Half a century later flourished Johan Ockeghem (1420-1512), who materially advanced his art by introducing greater freedom into his melodies, and even a suggestion of tenderness and expression. The latter qualities, however, are far more perceptible in the works of Jacob Obrecht (1430-1507), of whom it was said that "he had so much invention that he could compose a mass in one He was the music master of Erasmus, and he appears to have been a musician endowed with much feeling for expression. This shines through the dull science of his mass on the air "Fortuna desperata," and the beauty and pathos of the second "Agnus Dei" from this work were readily appreciated. The greatest master of the Netherlands school, Josquin des Prés, was illustrated by two madrigals and a hymn. More examples might have been included from the works of this gifted composer, who was so great a reformer that he was distrusted for a while by the dry-as-dust theorists, though he afterwards achieved a world-wide reputation. The Abbate Baini, in his life of Palestrina, says he became the idol of Europe. "There is no longer tolerance for any one but Josquin. Nothing is beautiful unless it be the work of Josquin. Nobody but Josquin in Italy. Nobody but Josquin in France. Nobody but Josquin in Germany, in Flanders, in Hungary, in Spain—Josquin and Josquin alone." Among other composers of somewhat later date, of whom examples were given, were Clemens non Papa, Cornelis Schuyt, Nikolaas Gombert, and Thomas Crecquillon. The last two names in chronological order were two of the greatest, Orlandus Lassus (1520-1594) and Jan Pieter Sweelinck (1562-1612). The former may be regarded as the founder of the modern homophonic school. His partsong, for such it is, "Matona mia," with its pretty refrain, took the fancy of the audience at once. In the music of Sweelinck the masculine vigour and energy, which are the special characteristics of Netherlandish music as compared with the school of Palestrina, reach their culminating point. The spirit and breadth of his setting of the psalms are remarkable, and he was unquestionably the first great composer for the organ, although his works for the instrument did not long survive him. Mr. S. de Lange introduced a fantasia, and also, somewhat incongruously, selections from Frescobaldi, Bach, and Handel. He is a good performer, but his persistent use of the full organ was very distressing to the ear, and awoke the echoes of the Albert Hall in a manner destructive of all effect. We must not omit to mention the remarkably spirited Flemish popular songs, dating from the time when the low countries were preparing to shake off the odious yoke of Spain. The Dutch artists sang throughout with perfection of ensemble, and, making allowance for the small number of voices and the uncomfortable largeness of the locale, the effect was in all cases highly satisfactory. These Concerts ought to bear fruit in calling the attention of choral societies to the mine of wealth awaiting their researches in the works of the old Flemish masters. We have societies at present which are especially concerned with antiquarian music, and it would be advantageous to them and agreeable to their patrons were the names of Obrecht, Josquin, Lassus, and Sweelinck to be sometimes found in their Concert programmes.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MDLLE. FOHSTRÖM, a young Russian vocalist, was placed at a disadvantage by making her first appearance at this establishment as Lucia in Donizetti's Opera, without rehearsal, on an evening when Madame Patti was unable to sing. But since then she has won her way to a fair place in public favour, not only in the Opera already we have before us five volumes of masses, psalms, Netherlandish songs, &c., being part of a series of reprints intonation, however, is by no means perfect; and as it is reported that she intends to devote herself to earnest study, it is but fair to withhold a decisive verdict upon her powers. But the principal event of what may truly be termed the "Patti season" has been the appearance of the prima donna as the heroine in Bizet's "Carmen"; and it need scarcely be said that an exceptionally large audience was attracted on the occasion. The music lies somewhat low for Madame Patti's voice, but the perfection of her vocalisation made the audience almost unconscious of this fact; and throughout the opera it was evident that she had made a minute study of the part. It is difficult, however, for one so thoroughly trained in the florid Italian school to refrain from introducing "ornaments," whether in or out of keeping with the design of the composer, and the occasional indulgence in these was a decided defect in the general rendering of the part. Although her acting was not so spontaneous as that of Madame Minnie Hauk, there was much to admire in it; and in many scenes there was a marked originality in her conception of the character. The rest of the parts, with the exception of Signor Del Puente as the Toreador, were by no means satisfactorily filled, M. Engel having no qualifications for the arduous character of Don Fosé, and Mdlle. Dotti making but a tame Michaela. of Don José, and Mdlle. Dotti making but a tame Michaela. Madame Patti's Margherita, in Gounod's "Faust," has proved the most popular of all her personations, but she has also appeared in "Linda di Chamouni," and "La Sonnambula," Saturday, the 25th ult., the last night of the season, being, according to Royal Italian Opera language, termed her "Gala," when she was presented at the close of the performance with a diamond bracelet, in honour of the completion of her twenty-fifth consecutive year at this theatre. A good word must be said for the year at this theatre. A good word must be said for the excellent conductorship of Signor Arditi, who, with an inferior band and chorus, has certainly made the very best use of the materials at his command during the season.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

A CONCERT by the students of this Institution was given at St. James's Hall on the 3rd ult., when an excellent specimen of the work of a pupil was submitted to a large audience—a Concertstück in C sharp minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, by Miss Dora Bright, the solo part of which was performed with much precision and delicacy by the composer. In every respect this piece reflects the utmost credit upon the youthful artist, and the applause with which it was received will, we trust, nerve her to increased exertion. Highly successful pianoforte solos were also played by Misses Mackness and M. Lyons, Mr. A. Dace, and Mr. Reddie; and the violin playing of Miss Winifred Robinson produced a marked impression, Mr. J. E. German also displaying decided talent on the same instrument. The solo singing was especially good, Miss K. Payne, Miss M. Hoare, and Mrs. Wilson-Osman being deserving of much commendation. Mr. W. Shakespeare (whose clever Dramatic Overture commenced the Concert) conducted with his usual care and precision.

MR. LESLIE'S CHOIR.

THE second and last Concert of this Association for the present season took place on Saturday afternoon, June 27, too late for notice in our July number. It was satisfactory to note the largely increased attendance as betokening a return of public confidence. We should confess to a mingled feeling of surprise and disappointment had it been otherwise, for, as we said last month, the musical work carried on by Mr. Leslie is national in its character, and it would be no sign of progress were the increased popularity of instrumental music to be attended by a loss of interest in a form of art in which this country has held pre-eminence for three centuries. Happily there are no serious symptoms of danger, and it is understood that Mr. Leslie has been sufficiently encouraged by the result of his recent Concerts to determine upon continuing the operations which ought never to have been suspended. The path that will lead to good returns is clearly defined. The choir must be recruited and strengthened, and when this has been done care must be taken to infuse a proper amount of interest into the Concert programmes. The conditions of success in Concert work have greatly changed recently. At one time it was dangerous to step ever so little out of the beaten track; but it is now fatal to trust wholly to routine. Mr. Leslie will know the proper course to pursue, while keeping well within the boundaries of his proper sphere-a sphere in which he need fear no rivals. Very little need be said concerning the Concert of June 27. The programme conconcerning the Concert of June 27. The programme contained some old favourites, such as Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," and Gounod's "Ave Verum" (written for the choir), which pleased as much as ever, thanks to a perfect rendering. The Conductor's new compositions, the lullaby, "Golden slumbers," and the madrigal, "Let me play the fool," were repeated by desire and were as warmly received as at the previous Concert. We should have been glad to note a larger infusion of the madrigalian element. That there is an appreciative public for this class of music was proved at the recent Concert given by the Bristol Madrigal Society, about which we speak in another column. It only remains to be mentioned that the clever violin playing of Mr. John Dunn, and the vocal solos of Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Maas, and Mr. M. Tufnail, gave the necessary relief to the part music.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE Concert given by this Society on June 30 was of a different character to previous performances, no orchestra being employed. This necessitated a change in the style of the programme; but here a certain amount of halfheartedness was shown. It is difficult to comprehend why Bach's magnificent motett "My spirit was in heaviness was selected for this occasion, as the work inevitably suffered by the loss of the proper accompaniments; and, besides this, a society which professes to labour solely for art should faithfully observe the intentions of a composer on every occasion, or at least should show good cause when any modification is made. To musicians interested in the early history of their art the revival of a portion of the "Four Passions" by Heinrich Schütz must have been specially attractive. Schütz was born in 1585, so that the performance partook of the nature of a ter-centenary celebration. He occupied the position of Kapellmeister at Dresden for many years, and gained a very widespread reputation as a teacher and a composer. He seems to have had many points in common with his great successor, J. S. Bach, born exactly a century later; and, so far as the strict rules by which music was then fettered would allow, he endowed his works with much expression and even dramatic feeling. Oddly enough, his name is not even mentioned in Grove's Dictionary, but a quantity of valuable information concerning him and the time in which he flourished will be found in Spitta's "Bach." The curious hiatus which occurred in German music between his epoch and that of Bach is accounted for by the blighting influences of the thirty years' war, almost as potent, though happily for the fatherland less enduring, than the "killing frost" of Puritanism in this country. How consistently Bach took up the work Schütz had laid down may be gathered from the extant music of the earlier composer. In the four Passions the same features are to be observed as in the inimitable settings of the Leipzig cantor. The Evangelist recites, and the rest of the singers, soloists, and chorus represent the various characters, and have also reflective airs and choruses. In the original there is no accompaniment; but Spitta says rightly that in the recitatives we frequently "detect an unexpected and varied melodic movement, which almost seems to demand a figured bass accompaniment." And speaking of sacred music generally at the time of Schütz he says: "Many motetts of the 17th century are inconceivable without the accompaniment of the organ or other instruments. This may be seen by the progression of the bass part, which not unfrequently lies above the tenor, and would make the harmony quite unrecognisable, if it were not supplemented by a 16-ft. organ bass." The Musical Society therefore should not be accused of vandalism in adding organ accompaniment to the selections given from Schütz's Passions. But, in order to avoid misconception, the fact of the addition should have been mentioned in the programme. The audience could not fail to be struck by the spirit and expressiveness of the music, and we should not feel surprised were other excerpts from Schütz to be given at future Concerts. The choir sang well, but was, on the whole, more commendable in a selection of old and modern madrigals in the second part. Herr Tivadar Nachez, a Hungarian violinist, was not happy in his choice of solos. He plays with much vigour, but he left much to desire in the matter of intonation, and the impression he created was only moderately favourable. Miss Amina Goodwin received well-deserved applause for her pianoforte solos, and Miss Annie Marriott, Miss M. McKenzie, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Ernest Birch were an efficient quartet of soloists. Mr. Barnby conducted the Concert.

MR. CUSINS'S CONCERT.

THE last few weeks of the musical season are generally devoted chiefly to benefit Concerts, a class of entertainment seldom coming within the survey of serious criticism. Some few Concerts of this kind, however, stand out from the remainder by reason of the exceptional quality of the programmes or of the talent engaged. In the latter respect, the Concert given by Mr. Cusins at St. James's Hall, on the 1st ult., was sufficiently remarkable to deserve record. The familiar announcement respecting Mr. Sims Reeves did not occasion so much disappointment this time, as the list of artists included the names of Madame Albani, Madame Scalchi, Signor Del Puente, Mr. Lloyd, Madame Néruda, and M. Lasserre. The efforts of these performers, singly and in combination, were confined to familiar pieces, so that it is only necessary to say concerning them that the audience manifested its delight by loud applause and encores. Special reference, however, must be made to the admirable pianoforte playing of the Concert-giver, both in Schubert's Trio in B flat and in solos by Schumann and Chopin. It may be because Mr. Cusins happens to be an Englishman that he is so seldom heard in the capacity of a pianist. We can assign no other reason.

SIGNOR CESI'S PIANOFORTE RECITAL.

THE Italians, to whom the honour is due of having invented the pianoforte, have not, as a nation, excelled on that instrument. It is specially a harmony instrument in the correct and technical signification of the word "harmony"; which, as Dr. Crotch defined it, means "a succession of chords expressed or understood." If, on the pianoforte, full chords are rather struck than played, and if, as scientific men say, the instrument gives "the end of a sound" rather than a sound, it amply compensates that defect, compared with other keyed instruments, by its powers of expression; which, in certain styles of music, particularly the "Chopinesque," are unequalled. The expression is not only in the easy variation of tempo in pearly or rippling cadenzas and melodic phrases, but in the facility with which a practised artist can play rapid phrases in harmonic intervals, and phrases that are not mere scale passages, but harmonised melodies. The Germans, who have made the pianoforte almost their national instrument from an artistic point of view, prefer a round and vigorous touch suited to the modern forms of polyphonous music in which they excel, and which they all but created. They are admittedly the most intellectual of players on this, the most intellectual of instruments. Still they do not necessarily excel in an expressive style of pianoforte playing, and lest any budding Englishborn genius should allow himself to be won over too easily by Germany, on the supposition there is no music and no pianoforte playing that is not Teutonic or Slav, we recommend him and his teachers not to lose the opportunity of hearing Signor Beniamino Cesi, if that Italian professor should favour London with another visit. The Recital he gave at Princes' Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the 15th ult., was attended by a select if not very numerous audience, who, on the conclusion of each piece, greeted the player with loud and genuine applause. It must be said that a very large proportion of his hearers were Italians. Passing over a transcription of an overture by Mozart, with which Signor Cesi, rather in ignorance of English notions of "music and morals," opened his Concert, the programme was evidently arranged historically, containing in the order here given the names of Bach, Scarlatti, Handel, and Clementi, Beethoven, Chopin, and Schumann—and, finally, those of the great modern virtuosi, Thalberg, Liszt, and Rubinstein. The object was, naturally, to display to a critical London audience the powers of the Italian artist in every style of music. The verdict we ourselves heard more than once in the Concert-room, in reference to Signor Cesi's playing, was-" marvellous, all round." He possesses great strength of wrist and an extraordinary facility in playing rapid octave passages with a minimum of apparent effort; still, the prevailing charm in Signor Cesi's performance is in its expression—in his liquid delicate passages, every feature in the harmony is enounced. Signor Cesi was thoroughly at home in the enounced. Signor Cesi was thoroughly at holine in music of Scarlatti; his inclinations seem to lean to that classic period. He played, too, Beethoven's "Sonata quasi Fantasia" with verve and intelligence; but to his London audience perhaps the greatest novelty and treat was his rendering of Handel's "Gavotta variata," Chopin's "Larghetto" from his Second Concerto, the same author's Polonaise (Opus 44), and an entr'acte from "Mignon," arranged by the performer himself. Signor Cesi is the principal Professor at the Royal College of Music in Naples; and in that city his Concerts of Classical Music enjoy a high reputation. He is also director of the Archivio Musicale of Naples, a musical periodical which commenced two or three years ago in an ambitious tone, in the highest degree praiseworthy. Signor Cesi left London for Italy soon after his Concert of the 15th ult., but he promises to return another year at an earlier period of the musical season, when we trust to our credit as a wellbred people he will meet with a hospitable reception.

THE NEW GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Nothing could have been simpler, nor, we may add, more appropriate than the proceedings at the laying of the foundation-stone of the proposed music school on the Thames Embankment on the 21st ult. It was expected that Royalty would have assisted at this ceremony, but certain difficulties arose, and the arrangements were carried through by a number of city gentlemen in a manner suitable, as we have said, to the character of the undertaking. Mr. Pearce Morrison, the chairman of the Music Committee of the Corporation, dealt with facts in his speech previous to laying the stone, and no amount of eloquence could have been more persuasive than the bare statement of these facts. When a disused warehouse in Aldermanbury was opened as a music-school in the autumn of 1880, accommodation was provided for a maximum of 300 students. In three months this number was considerably exceeded, and pupils have continued to pour in so rapidly that the number at the end of the recent term was 2,400, exclusive of 300 members of the Guildhall orchestra and choir. During the five years £56,000 has been paid to professors, so that the accusation of the school being injurious to teachers is simply preposterous. The main object of the institution is the musical education of the general public, and, as Mr. Morrison pointed out, many of the pupils are drawn from the humbler ranks of life, the school being open to a late hour at night. This fact, however, will only add force to his appeal to the City Guilds to endow scholarships for the benefit of poor but gifted students. His suggestion was received with so much applause, that it is safe to look forward to its being acted upon to a liberal extent. From the published description of the new building, for which the sum of £20,000 has been voted, it would seem that utility rather than ornament is to be the main object kept in view. There are to be 42 classrooms on the ground floor and first floor; and on the second floor a practice room 70 feet by 28 on the model of the concert hall in the no longer existing Surrey Gardens, two large harmony classrooms, and an organ practice room. Of the general details of the building and its architectural features, for which Mr. Horace Jones is responsible, it will be time enough to speak when it is ready for occupation, which it is hoped will be not later than September next year.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

WHEN the late Dean Stanley, of honoured memory, lent his sanction, some fifteen years back, to the performance in Westminster Abbey, by full orchestra and chorus, of Bach's Passion music, his action was condemned in no measured terms by a certain section of the Press. Happily this vindictive Puritanism has so far abated that the announcement of a Handel Commemoration in Westminster Abbey, with full musical accessories, excited not a word of protest or adverse comment. The choice of the Dettingen Te Deum as the main musical feature of the service, may perhaps be called in question. It is exceedingly long, uncompromisingly Handelian, and abounds in very obvious reminiscences. But with the execution on the 14th ult. little fault was to be found. Full justice was done to the broad choral effects of the work, the trebles in particular singing with excellent intonation and vigour of attack. The Organ Concerto which followed (No. 4 of the second set) formed an admirable contrast by its brightness to the solidity of the Te Deum, after which Madame Albani, who was in excellent voice, gave a very fine rendering of "Angels ever bright and fair." The singing of the rooth Psalm by the entire congregation concluded the Service in a most impressive manner. The attendance was exceedingly large, and it is to be hoped that a substantial sum has been realised for the Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain, in aid of which benevolent institution the offertory was to be devoted.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

New York, July 10, 1885.

THE only occurrence of importance in the American Metropolis since my last letter appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES was the ninth annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association, held in the Academy of Music during the first three days of the present month. The Association had its origin in Ohio, and for a space of two-thirds of its existence was little more than a vehicle for spreading intelligence concerning methods of instruction (which is primarily its mission), and an influence for bettering the standard of musicians in the United States. It is only since the musicians of the Eastern cities have begun to take an interest in it that its purposes have been widened, and it has shown a capacity for advancing the interests of the musical art throughout the country. both of these respects the meeting which took place last week was the most potent and profitable ever held, though it was not so numerously attended as the eighth annual meeting held in Cleveland in July, 1884. For the first time in the history of the Association, this year a series of pianoforte recitals and Concerts of magnitude was given in connection with the meeting, and the teachers were thereby instructed concerning the executive skill of half-adozen of the foremost players of the country, and the creative skill of twice as many native composers. This result was due to the choice of New York as the meetingplace, since in no other city, with the exception of Boston, could so many capable instrumental musicians, solo singers, and choristers have been got together after the close of the musical season. The president of the body, Dr. S. N. Penfield, is a resident of this city, and almost entirely through his exertions an orchestra of fifty instrumentalists, a chorus of 200 voices and capable vocalists were enlisted in the musical portions of the programme for the meeting, which every day enlivened the sessions of the word at the meeting of the word at the following the musical pedagogy. There can be no question that in spite of much crudeness in the compositions and their interpretation, these Concerts gave a mighty impulse to the movement in favour of American music. I have already called the attention of the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES to the effort making to secure merited honour to native talent in the field of composition in reviewing the novelty Concerts given by Mr. Van der Stucken in Steinway Hall last season. Their efforts have found a hearty second in several quarters. The New York Tribune newspaper has thrown its great influence into the work, and after the American novelty Concert in this City the Apollo Club of Boston devoted an entire evening to the music of native composers, and Mr. Neuendorff, now at the head of the Boston Populars, made up a programme entirely of compositions by Boston musicians. indicates a decided awakening on the subject, and it is not out of the domain of probability that before long the men who have the cause most earnestly at heart will be called upon to proclaim a halt to prevent the agitation taking an extravagant turn.

Something like this was seen last week when the National Association found itself obliged to lay on the table a resolution offered in perfect good faith that at the next meeting no music except that produced by musicians native to or resident in the United States be admitted to This resolution, of course, was the not the programmes. unnatural result of the reaction against the neglect with which managers and conductors have treated American musicians for many years, but the wisdom of these same musicians was sufficient to enable them to see that such a step would work far more harm than good. A much more intelligent movement in the desired direction was taken when resolutions were adopted and ordered to be printed and distributed among the musicians of the country favouring an international musical copyright law. This This agitation was begun last year when a Committee of the Association sent a petition on the subject to Congress. To the arguments contained in this petition the signatures of all the musicians of note in the country, and of publishers representing seven-eighths of the capital engaged in the music publishing business were obtained; but the memorial shared the usual fate of such memorials. The committee was continued this year and will move upon the national legislature again. It is hardly to be expected, however, that the musicians will succeed where the authors have thus far failed.

Concerning the characteristics and merit of the compositions produced at the recent meeting it will hardly be expected that I should speak much. Only a few of the smaller pieces have got into print, and it is doubtful if any will ever make the journey across the ocean. Except in one instance, moreover, there was no exhibition of original traits, and in this one instance the originality lay chiefly in its outlandish badness. The piece was a Chicago production, an extract from an opera, by Silas G. Pratt, who seems fondly to imagine that an utter disregard for all the accepted canons of writing, and a complete suppression of everything remotely resembling the beautiful, may be held to be music if only put out with sufficient assurance. The remaining compositions were mostly well-written, but could not be said to claim any special distinc-The list of larger works performed was as tion. follows:-

As I dispose of these compositions with a mere mention of their titles, so also I can do no more with the discussions of the Association than to mention the subjects and the readers of the essays in the order in which they were presented. They were: "Musician, Critic, and Public," by

H. E. Krehbiel, musical critic of The New York Tribune : "Harmony as introductory to Composition and Performance," by C. L. Capen, of Boston; "Music in the Public Schools," by George F. Bristow, of New York; "Education in Music at Home and Abroad," by the Hon. John Eaton, Commissioner of Education for the United States, Eaton, Commissioner of Education for the United States, Washington; "The Italian and German Schools of Vocal Culture," by F. W. Root, Chicago; "Accentuation in Pianoforte playing," by William Mason, of New York; "What is Church Music?" by John R. Cornell, of New York; "Violin Bowing," by E. A. Schultze, of Atlanta, Georgia; "The Value of Mechanical Apparatus and Operations for Cultivation of Technique," by W. H. Dana, of Warren, Ohio, and Dr. W. S. Forbes, of Philadelphia. The essays were all thoughtful, but the full measure of cood which might have been derived from them was want. good which might have been derived from them was wanting owing to the fact that insufficient time was devoted to the debates which followed them. It was seldom that a discussion got well under weigh was not nipped in the bud by an announcement that the time had arrived for the next subject or a pianoforte recital. The next meeting is to be held in July, 1886, at Boston, when it is thought a considerable delegation of musicians from Canada will be in attendance. Four of them were present this time, and their manifestation of interest in the Association was so great that there was talk of changing the title of the Association so as to make it cover the province north of the United States, but the question arose when there was too little time left for action. Mr. Waugh Lander, of Ontario, was, however, made Vice-President, and promised to organise an Auxiliary Society in Canada before next

The only musical performances which the metropolis is enjoying at present are the representations of comic operettas. Of works in this department two hold the stage—an adaptation of Millöcker's "Feld-Prediger," called "The Black Hussar," at Wallack's Theatre, and an adaptation of Genée's "Nanon," at the Casino. Theodore Thomas has been absent from the city with his orchestra for nearly three months, his tour extending as far as San Francisco. Thither he was accompanied by Frau Materna, and other vocalists; but the financial outcome of the enterprise was, we believe, not very satisfactory. Opera in German at the Metropolitan Opera House will next year be conducted by Musik-Direktor

AT the annual meeting of the Royal College of Music, held at Marlborough House, on the 4th ult., under the presidency of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, there was a large attendance of the Council and members of the Corporation of the College. The report of the Council having been read, it was moved by the president, seconded by the Duke of Cambridge, and resolved that the report and accounts be received and adopted. This report points out that the present building is now scarcely sufficient for the purposes of the College, and that in a short time the question of providing further accommodation, both for teaching and residence, will have to be considered Mr. Brinsmead announced his intention to give a grand pianoforte every third year for competition among the pupils of the College. The capital account shows that the total amount received and invested is £112,175 128, 2d., and the revenue account shows a balance of income over expenditure of £1,297 18s. 9d.

MR. C. M. GREIG, of Albany, writes to us as follows: "Forty gentlemen of this city have formed a Men's Club, who will sing under my direction next Season as the Novello Club. It was deemed proper for the club in this way to recognise a name which is intimately associated with much of the progress of modern musical art, through the dissemination of good music in a cheap and popular form. Some eight years ago I formed a club of mixed voices which bore the name of the Novello Madrigal Club. I am sure that your firm will unite with me in wishing the new organisation a considerable success, and a useful career." We need scarcely say that our hearty and earnest good wishes are with this newly formed Club and its able and indefatigable Director.

THE annual distribution of prizes to the students of the Royal Academy of Music took place at St. James's Hall, on the 24th ult., before a large audience; the awards being presented by the Right Hon. Lady Aberdare. The proceedings commenced with an excellent rendering, by the female choir of the Academy, of two clever choral songs by G. J. Bennett, late a student of the institution. Sir George Macfarren, Principal of the Academy, then, in an earnest and sympathetic speech, introduced the business of the meeting, and Lady Aberdare handed the awards to the successful pupils. The following were the Memorial Prizes: The Charles Lucas Silver Medal—J. E. German. The Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal—William Nicholl. The Sterndale Bennett Prize (purse of ten guineas)—Jane Taylor. The Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal—Blanche Murray. The Evill Prize (purse of ten guineas)—Charles Copland. The Heathcote Long Prize (purse of ten guineas) -Frederick J. Gostelow. The Santley Prize (purse of ten guineas) - Septimus B. Webbe. The Bonamy Dobree Prize (purse of ten guineas)-Ernest Burton. The Kelsall Prize (the last of five violins bequeathed by the late Charles Kelsall, Esq.)-Winifred Robinson. The following were the medals and awards in the female department: Certificates of Merit—Harmony: Davenport, Gillington; Singing: Arnold, Bocquet, Booth, Dwelley, Eddison, Harrison, Hoare, McKrill, Payne, Watkis; Pianoforte: Harrison, Hoare, McKrill, Payne, Watkis; Planoforte: Boyce, Rix, A. Robinson, D. Robinson, Samuelson, Stephenson, Young; Harp: Jones. Silver Medals—Harmony: Rose; Singing: Armfield, Clarke, Parry, Rose, St. Clair, Wilson-Osman, Winn; Planoforte: Butler, Corper, Hann, Heal, Horrocks, James, Pinwell, Shaw, Surville, Taylor, Madals, Ma Webb; Organ: Robinson; Harp: Audain. In the Male Department the awards were as under: Certificates of Merit—Harmony: Baker, Briant, Hattersley, Knott, Metcalt; Singing: Barker, Copland, Edwards; Pianoforte: Fox, Gwyn, Norton; Organ: Tonking; Violin: German, Hann, Newton, Windeatt. Silver Medals—Harmony: German; Singing, David Haslaw, Pianoforte, Powley Gerstelow, Victoria ing: Davis, Harley; Pianoforte: Fowles, Gostelow, Kipps, Mackway, Philpot; Violin: Tonking; Violoncello: Burnett, Cooke, Gill. Bronze Medals—Harmony: Anderton, Fison, Godfrey, Gwyn, Kiver, Lazareck, Mackway, Nunn, Pettman, Thomas, Todd; Singing: Grove, Jones, Nicholl; Pianoforte: Hann, Harrison, Hawley, Hollier, Howgrave, Planoforte: Hann, Harrison, Hawley, Hollief, Howgrave, Hulland, Lemare, Williams; Organ: Kipps, Thomas, Steggall; Violin: Frewin, Ould, Walenn, Wilby; Violoncello: Carrodus; Flute: Griffiths; Hautboy: Horton; Sight Singing: Edwards, Fox, Gostelow, Izard, Tonking; Elocution: Holt. For languages, books were awarded to Mr. Lazareck (Italian), Miss Frost (German), and Miss McGrath (French); a violin bow was presented to A. Pulham; and commendations were given to a large number of students in both departments. At the conclusion of the presentation of awards, Lord Aberdare addressed the audience, and the National Anthem was sung by the full choir; Mr. W. Shakespeare conducted.

The competition for the "Lady Jenkinson Prize," a purse of five pounds, for the best performance of Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto in E flat, took place at the Guildhall School of Music on the 17th uit. The prize was divided between Miss Kate Honey (pupil of Mr. John Francis Barnett) and Miss Florence Rosenthal (pupil of Professor Ernst Pauer). The judges were Mr. Henry Gadsby, Mr. Thomas Wingham, Mr. Thomas Pettit, and the Principal (Mr. H. Weist Hill).

In the Report of the St. John's Choral Society, Newfoundland, for 1884-85, the Committee congratulates the Society on a fairly prosperous season. The attendance has been larger than that of either of the preceding two years, and the results have been to a great extent satisfac-The first Concert was given on Dec. 29 of last year, when Handel's "Messiah" was performed, and the second on Feb. 13, 1885, which consisted of glees and miscellaneous songs, &c.; but the greatest success of the winter has been "The Crusaders," by N. W. Gade. This work was rendered with excellent effect on April 13, and repeated on the 20th, when, as in the first performance, the combined accompaniment of the pianoforte and harmonium was introduced. In this piece the solo parts were very efficiently taken by Miss Baker (Armida), Mr. Burchell (Peter the Hermit), and Rev. H. Dunfield (Rinaldo.) Financially, the past season has been a success, as, after paying a balance from last year of £8 16s. 6d., there remained to the credit of the Society the sum of £35 6s. 9d., part of which (£15 2s. 6d.) has been invested in the purchase of a gold watch as a present for Miss Rowe, and the balance handed to Mr. Rowe. Cordial thanks are voted to Mr. Withers (Organist of the Cathedral) for the excellent manner in which he accompanied the singing of "The Crusaders" on the harmonium, and also to Mr. and Miss Rowe, the Conductor and Pianist of the Society, for the energy, zeal, and skill with which they have performed their arduous share of the important work of the Society.

THE Anniversary Festival of the Croydon Church Choirs Union was held on June 25. There was a Choral Celebration of the Holy Communion at seven a.m., at the Parish Church, the service being Garrett in D; the Nunc dimittis (Barnby in E flat) being sung during ablutions. The service throughout was well rendered. In the afternoon an Organ Recital was given by Mr. F. Cambridge, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, Mr. E. G. Ingrams, Organist of the Parish Church, Wallington, and Mr. H. J. Vaughan, late Organist and Choirmaster of St. Peter's, Croydon. At eight o'clock there was full Choral Evensong at the Parish Church, which was attended by an enormous congregation. The choirs and clergy numbered in all about 350. The first part of the service was sung by the Rev. W. G. Langdon, the Rev. H. E. Trimmer taking the concluding portion. Stainer's Evening Service in B was most carefully and effectively given. The String Band—the feet time at these Eschizels—randered valuable aid in the first time at these Festivals-rendered valuable aid in the Symphonies and Nunc dimittis. The anthem was "I will give thanks" (Hopkins). The sermon was preached by the Rev. Edwin Price, Minor Canon of Westminster. During the Offertory two Hymns, and subsequently Smart's Te Deum in F were sung. Mr. H. L. Balfour presided at the organ during the services, and also played several solos. Great praise is due to Mr. F. Cambridge, the honorary Choirmaster of the Union, for the care and attention with which the choirs had been trained, and also for the able manner in which he conducted.

THE Chevalier Leonhard Emil Bach gave his second and last Concert this season on the 10th ult., at St. James's Hall, assisted by Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Medora Henson, Signor Novara, and a select orchestra presided over by Signor Randegger. Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto in C minor (Op. 37), pieces by Chopin and Liszt, and a Capriccio Polonaise for pianoforte and orchestra, of his own composition, afforded an opportunity to the concertgiver to manifest his distinguished and versatile talents both as a performer and a composer of considerable merit. In the latter capacity his success, on the present occasion, culminated in the charming rendering by Madame Antoinette Sterling of four nursery songs (forming part of a collection entitled "Carols of Cradleland," about to be published by Novello, Ewer & Co.), one of which, "Our Baby," was vociferously encored, and there can be little room for doubt that these simply yet effectively written songlets will soon become popular in the quarter for which they are more especially intended. The programme also included a very efficient interpretation of the Prelude to Act III., and the Banquet Dance from Sir Arthur Sullivan's highly characteristic "Tempest" music; Signor Randegger conducting with his usual ability and tact.

On Saturday, the 18th ult., the second annual Choral Festival of the Association of Tonic Sol-fa Choirs took place at the Albert Palace, Battersea Park, when two Concerts were given by about 1,300 singers from 25 of the associated choirs. The programme of the afternoon Conassociated control of the armound of the armound control of the armound of the ar Barnby, Hatton, Smart, Pearsall, and Pierson. The even-Barnby, Hatton, Smart, Pearsall, and Pierson. The evening Concert commenced with an excellent performance of Dr. Stainer's Cantata "The Daughter of Jairus." The second part included Macfarren's "Hark the lark"; Pearsall's "When Allen-a-Dale"; Wagner's "Hail, bright abode," and other pieces by Mendelssohn, Barnby, Pinsuti, W. Macfarren, and T. Morley. The solo vocalists were Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. W. There M. A. I. Coldigort, Mrs. Bec. and Mr. Wete Miss Mariania Felina, Mr. 1907 McNay, and Mr. W. H. Brereton; Mr. A. J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., and Mr. William Hodge presided at the organ, and Mr. W. H. Harper, and Mrs. W. G. McNaught at the pianoforte. The Conductors were Mr. W. G. McNaught, and Mr. L. C. Venables, and the general arrangements were under the direction of the Hon. Sec. to the Association, Mr. W. H. Bonner. Among the many attractions of the day must be mentioned the performances of the "National Orchestra" of the Palace, conducted by Mr. A. J. Caldicott, and the Company's military band, conducted by Mr. Hiram Henton.

At the first Concert for the season of the Tenbury Musical Society, on the 1st ult., the Rev. Sir Frederick Ouseley's Oratorio, "The Martyrdom of St. Polycarp," was performed with marked success, the composer at the conclusion of the work receiving quite an ovation. The Oratorio was written in 1854, for the degree of Doctor of Music, and as its reception at Tenbury justifies the hope that it will ere long be repeated elsewhere, we are glad to say that it has recently been published, for the first time, in vocal score with pianoforte accompaniment, by Messrs.
Novello, Ewer and Co. Every justice was done to the composition by the Society, both in the solo and choral portions, the principal vocalists—Miss Antelli, Mr. Anstice, and Mr. D. Harrison—being thoroughly efficient in the music allotted to them (Mr. Harrison, in the air "Yet let me pray," receiving enthusiastic and well deserved applause), and the whole of the choruses showing the result of careful preparation. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer"—the solo excellently rendered by Mrs. Joyce—Hiller's "Song of Victory"—in the solo part of which Miss Kate Probert especially distinguished herself—and Walmisley's Anthem, "The Lord will comfort Zion," formed the second part of the programme. The chorus and band, under the leadership of the Rev. J. Hampton and Mr. W. Claxton respectively, were everything that could be desired.

THE prospectus of the Huddersfield Choral Society announces three Concerts for the season 1885-86. At the first, on October 16, Prout's "Hereward" will be given, conducted by the composer; at the second, on December 18, Handel's "Messiah"; and at the third, on March 19, 1886, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." For these performances eminent solo vocalists are engaged, the band will be considerably augmented, and Mr. H. L. Parratt will preside at the organ. We may mention that Huddersfield is rich in choral societies; for, in addition to the one already mentioned—which consists of 430 performers, and is the largest in Yorkshire-there is the Glee and Madrigal Society (100 performers), the Orpheus Society (150 performers), and the Philharmonic Society-orchestra only (75 performers), all of which are well patronised and highly appreciated.

A VARIETY in the musical programme at the Inventions Exhibition was given on Thursday, the 9th ult., when a most interesting Lecture was delivered by the Rev. J. Collingwood Bruce, LL.D., F.S.A., on "Northumbrian Pipe and Ballad Music." The musical illustrations were given by pipers from the North, and by a special choir under the conductorship of Mr. J. Westwood Tosh, assistant music superintendent to the School Board for London. The programme included the old ballads "Chevy Chase," "Derwentwater's Good Night," &c., and the whole of the

By the Annual Report of the Belfast Philharmonic Society we find that the past season has been one of the most successful since the Society was established. At the first Concert a number of the leading vocalists appeared -amongst whom were Madame Trebelli and Mr. Maasat the second, Gounod's Oratorio "The Redemption, performed for the first time in Belfast, attracted a large and highly appreciative audience. The first part of the Concert, in commemoration of the bi-centenary of the birth of Handel, was devoted exclusively to that composer's works; and the concluding Concert—this year being also the bi-centenary of the birth of Bach—included a selection from his best compositions. Three Chamber Concerts were given with much success during the season, the "Heckmann Quartet" appearing at the second. These performances took place under the auspices of, but without any expense to, the Society; and it is hoped that next year they may be continued, and made self-supporting. The Committee pays a well-earned tribute to the musical ability and indefatigable exertions of the Conductor, Herr Beyschlag; and it must be recorded that, as a graceful and spontaneous expression of their appreciation of his valuable services, the chorus and orchestra presented him, previous to the last Concert of the season, with a gold-mounted conductor's bâton.

An excellent Recital was given by the pupils of the Harrow Music School (South Hampstead Branch), on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult., at the Eyre Arms Assembly Rooms. The selection of music was of a high class, being taken from the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Schumann, Mozart, Raff, &c., and the performance was of more than average merit. Amongst the instrumental items most worthy of mention Amongst the instrumental terms most worldy of infention were a duet for two pianos, Schumann's Andante and Variations, Miss Florence Stephens and Miss Theresa Slocombe; a Sarabande by John Farmer, Miss Jessie Oliver; the pianoforte performances by Miss Ethel Stephens, Miss Annie White, and Miss Annie Benito, and Stephens, Miss Annie White, and Miss Annie Benito, and the rendering of the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto (violin), by Master Alfred Slocombe. Vocal pieces were contributed by Miss Minnie Spackman, Miss Katie Howell, Miss Carrie Stephens, Mrs. Brooks, Mr. Cuthbert Wills, and Mr. David Strong, the last named gentleman singing with great effect Kücken's "Bird, fly-from hence (violoncello obbligato, Mr. Trust). A duet for two pianofortes was also excellently played by Miss H. L. Fox and Miss Bessie Frost, the principals of the school, who deserve warm praise for the efficient manner in which they are warm praise for the efficient manner in which they are carrying on the work of the institution.

On Monday, the 13th ult., the fifteenth anniversary of the Consecration of St. Philip's Church, Queen's Road, Battersea, was commemorated by a Festal Evensong, at which a large portion of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was sung as the anthem. The choir of the Church was augmented by the choirs of St. Mildred's, Lee, and St. Botolph, Aldgate, and consisted of over 100 voices. Botolph, Aldgate, and consisted of over 100 tokes. The principal solo parts were taken by Master Doherty, Messrs. H. J. Walker, C. Langton, and Thornton Colvin. The air "Jerusalem" was beautifully sung by Master Doherty, and Mr. C. Langton gave an excellent rendering of "Be thou faithful." "O God, have mercy" was finely rendered by Mr. Thornton Colvin, whose sympathetic voice was heard to great advantage in this air and the recitatives. The choruses were sung with great precision and fine effect. Mr. Howard Leask, Organist of St. Mildred's, Lee. presided at the organ, and Mr. W. T. Goold, Organist of St. Botolph, at the pianoforte. Mr. George Winny con-

An excellent idea is well carried out in the "Boston Musical Year-Book," the second volume of which, for the season 1884-85, has just reached us. Mr. G. H. Wilson, whose name appears on the title-page as the compiler of the work, deserves much credit for the manner in which he has performed his task, a faithful record being given of all the compositions played at Concerts during the year in Boston. A list of the first performance of new works throughout the musical world also appears; and if more subscribers can be secured, it is hoped that the scope of the book may be still further increased. Certainly the music was rendered with the utmost finish and expression. undertaking is one deserving of extensive patronage.

THE second season of the London Wagner Society was brought to a successful conclusion on Friday evening, the arth ult., with a Dramatic Reading by Miss Alma Murray. The programme was a singularly interesting one, comprising selections from Wagner's "Tristan" and "Götterdammerung," the "Agamemnon" of Eschylus, Shelley's "Cenci," Browning's "Pippa Passes," and a poem by Victor Hugo, "La Ville Disparue." The translations were furnished by Mr. Alfred Forman. The translations appeared to signal advantage throughout the evening. Musical excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," by the Misses Mary and E. G. Carmichael, formed an There was a agreeable interlude in the entertainment. large audience, which included Mr. Robert Browning. At the close Mr. Moseley, one of the Honorary Secretaries drew attention to the past season, which had brought forward a lecture on "Parsifal" by Mr. Charles Dowdeswell, another on "Tristan und Isolde," by Mr. H. F. Frost, assisted by Mr. J. S. Shedlock, B.A., and a Conference by Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, as well as a Conversazione. Perhaps the most encouraging sign, however, was a large accession of members, including many well known representative musicians, and other persons of mark in the world of art.

The British Medical Fournal of the 4th ult. says: "We reported some time since a new operation of subcutaneous division of the exterior tendon slips of the ring finger, which had been performed successfully in America, with the object and result of extending the range of movement of the fingers in pianoforte playing. This proceeding has been repeated recently in London by Mr. Noble Smith, Queen Anne Street, with results which he records as satisfactory." He says: "I have just succeeded in freeing the ring finger of the right hand of an accomplished lady pianist, without causing her much more pain than is felt from the prick of a needle. Before operation she was able to raise the finger only five-eighths of an inch beyond the others. Directly after operation she could raise the finger easily to one-and-a-half inches, without the least feeling of loss of control over its action. The division was, of course, made subcutaneously, so that only a minute wound was left in the skin, one-eighth of an inch in length."

WE sincerely hope that the appeal for funds to purchase an organ for the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, commonly called Christ Church, Dublin, will be most liberally responded to. It is well known that there does not exist in the United Kingdom a more beautiful specimen of ecclesiastical architecture than this Cathedral; and the efforts of the Dean and Chapter and the Cathedral Board to obtain an instrument worthy of such a magnificent structure should receive the earnest support of all who desire that the worship maintained in our Cathedrals for so many centuries shall not be allowed to deteriorate. It is estimated that at least £1,000 will be required for this object; and subscriptions will be received by any member of the Organ Committee (which is headed by His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Dublin, Dean), by the Secretary, Frederick W. Leeper, Esq., Diocesan Offices, 17, Lower Baggott Street, Dublin, or at the Royal Bank, Dublin.

THE Wycliffe Chapel Choir gave an evening Concert in the chapel, Philpot Street, Commercial Road East, on Tuesday, June 30. The programme included the music which gained the choir the first prize and bronze medal at the late East London Industrial Exhibition. Beethoven's Sonata, No. 2, was admirably played by Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe, Organist of St. Luke's, Hackney, and this as well as the other items in the programme were well received. The Rev. Charles Lemaire, the pastor, in proposing a vote of thanks to the choirmaster, Mr. George Merritt, G.T.S.C., the soloists, and choir, expressed a hope that the Concert would be repeated in the early autumn.

At the Albert Palace, "The Messiah" was performed not net 18th ult., with Miss Albu, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. Abercrombie, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint as principal soloists, On the 25th ult., Mr. W. Carter's "Placida" and Rossin's "Stabat Mater" were given, the soloists being Miss Pattie Winter, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Signor Fabrini, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Carter conducted, and Mr. A. J. Caldicott presided at the organ.

THE Report of the thirteenth season of the "Apollo Musical Club," Chicago (Mr. Wm. L. Tomlins, Conductor), shows that although the Concerts given have been highly satisfactory in an artistic sense, the patronage of the public by no means encourages the officers of the Institution to exert their best energies in the cause. The future of the Club, it is announced, depends mainly upon its finances; but partly upon the decision of Mr. Tomlins whether he shall go to a wider field of usefulness in New York, or remain in Chicago. It is sincerely to be hoped that the inhabitants of the city will do their utmost to prevent the decline of a Society which has effected so much for the spread of the art; and also that the promise of increased and tangible support may secure the continued services of so talented and zealous a director as Mr. Tomlins, the loss of whom would indeed be severely felt, not only by the Club, but by the whole of the music-loving residents in Chicago.

THE London Conservatoire of Music gave its annual benefit Concert on the 9th ult., at St. James's Hall, when a very miscellaneous and, we may add, scarcely judicious programme was provided on the part of an institution claiming to be a representative one, as regards art-cultivation in the metropolis. There was, however, a plentiful array of solo-performers, including Madame Jenny Viard-Louis, Herr Franz Leideritz, Mr. Basil Althaus, Madame Adelina Hirlemann, and Mr. Gerard Coventry. Mr. Sims Reeves, whose appearance had been advertised, was indisposed, his place being, however, admirably filled by Mr. Edward Lloyd, who contributed Blumenthal's "My Queen" and Balfe's well-worn "Then you'll remember me," to the evening's proceedings. Some choral numbers were very creditably rendered by the students' choir, conducted by Mr. Walter Wesche. There was a very good attendance.

MDLLE. HELÈNE ARNIM gave a Matinée Musicale, on the 7th ult., at Steinway Hall, with considerable success. Mdlle. Arnim, who was in excellent voice, sang the aria, "Confusa si miri," from Handel's "Rodelinda," and Brahms's Song "Verzagen" (the difficult accompaniment to which was ably played by Mr. Bampfylde), and Macfarren's "When I come, love," in which she was encored. Duets by Dvorák, Rubinstein, and Brahms were also sung by Mdlle. Arnim and Mdlle. Pauline Cramer. The Concert-giver was assisted in the vocal department by Miss Amy Aylward, Madame Zimeri, Mr. Denis Hart, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike (who was encored in a song, by G. F. Cobb, "O wind that blows out of the west"). The violin solos, given by Mdlle. Marianne Eissler, were much appreciated, and a pianoforte solo by Mr. Carl Armbruster and recitation by Miss Rosa Kenney completed a very interesting programme.

At a Concert given in the Kensington Town Hall on the 14th ult., by Mr. T. Henry Webb, who for some years has held the post of Organist of Calcutta Cathedral, a new and very remarkable singer was heard for the first time, in the person of a young Indian lady, Miss Alice Gomes. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano of beautiful quality, having the same sympathetic timbre as Madame Trebelli's; her phrasing and expression leaves nothing to be desired, and she possesses an unusual degree of musical intelligence. In Gluck's "Vieni che poi sereno," she was thoroughly successful.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society gave their 161st Monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 17th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, solos being contributed by Miss Annie Layton, Mr. E. L. Frederick, Mr. Ler McKay, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. The part music included the trio, "Night sinks on the wave" (H. Smart), "Now by day's retiring lamp" (Bishop), and "The lion and the four wolves" (Filby). F. H. Cowen's Cantata, "The Rose Maiden," comprised the second part, the solos being taken by Miss Louise Bond, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. A. J. Layton, all of whom did ample justice to the work. The choruses were rendered with much precision, and expression. Mrs. P. P. Frame presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

MR. FERDINAND PRAEGER gave a Morning Concert at Messrs. Collard's Rooms, on the 8th ult., the programme consisting entirely of his own compositions. The music comprised twelve songs, two string quartets, and a duet for piano and violin. The executants were Misses Aylward and Arnim, and Herr Höfler, vocalists; Madame Frickenhaus, pianist; and Herr Josef Ludwig, Messrs. Collins, Gibson, and Koopmann, string players. The music was thoroughly enjoyed by a highly appreciative audience.

At the Conversazione of the Royal Society of Fine Arts, held at the Inventions Exhibition on the 3rd ult., an interesting Recital on the magnificent Concert grand pianoforte, exhibited by Rudolf Iboch Sohn, was given by Mr. Ernest Wertheim, who displayed the exceptionally fine tone of the instrument to much advantage. Mr. Iboch is Court manufacturer to the Emperor of Germany, an appointment which has only been conferred on one other German maker, namely, Mr. Bechstein.

THE Chelsea Musical Society, which, owing to the energy of the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Fred. Bailey, is now in a flourishing condition, gave its fourteenth evening Concert on Tuesday, June 23, in the Schoolroom, Park Walk. The choral numbers were, on the whole, well rendered, and the Society's band, under the direction of Mr. J. Somes, played in a creditable manner. Songs were also contributed and well received. Mr. H. J. Ollive conducted, and Mr. A. Fagge accompanied.

MR. STANLEY MAYO gave his Concert on the 7th ult., at St. James's Hall, assisted by Mesdames Lavinia Botto, Agnes Rolfe, Nellie Cresswick, Marguerite Somerville, Ellen Foster, Alice Leslie, and Mdlle. D'Orla; Messrs. W. Durant, Edward Prior, W. Taylor and Henry Gauntlet. Miss Frances Lyon accompanied. The artists were all highly successful. In the course of the evening Mrs. Stanley Mayo recited the "Lady of Provence," receiving well-merited applause. There was a large audience.

MR. ERNEST A. WILLIAMS gave a highly successful Musical and Dramatic Matinée at Burlington Hall, Saville Row, on the 4th ult. The items calling for special mention were "The Martyr," a new MS. song by Gordon Sutherland, sung by Mr. Williams, the same gentleman's Recitals from "Lallah Rookh," "The White Owl," and "The Spanish Champion," Mr. Pritchard's Musical Sketches, and Miss Meredyth Elliott's singing of "The Lost Chord."

In our last number mention was made of a special trumpet being used for the first time in Bach's Cantata "Ein feste' Burg," performed by the Cambridge University Musical Society. It may be interesting to our readers to know that the makers of this instrument are Messrs. Silvani & Smith, of 4, Whitecross Place, Wilson Street, Finsbury.

The Kyrle Choir gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. Katharine's Church, Rotherhithe, on the 2nd ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Alice Fripp, Miss Minna Vivian, Mr. Henry Yates, and Mr. Jabez West. Mr. Albert Orme conducted, and Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

MR. W. T. GOOLD, who has for many years held the post of Organist and Director of the Choir of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, has been appointed to the additional duties of Organist and Choirmaster of Broxbourne Parish Church, Herts.

An Organ Recital was given at Christ Church, Spitalfields, on June 25, by Dr. C. J. Frost, who played selections from Guilmant, Capocci, Hermann, Wely, and Hopkins, and a new Sonata by Dr. Bridge of Westminster. The fine organ in the church was displayed to the utmost advantage by the executant.

At the recent Conservatoire examination in Paris, a Miss Moore, a young English lady, took the first prize for singing, her voice being a really splendid soprano. This is the first time this much coveted prize has fallen to an English-woman since it was won by the late Miss Augusta Thompson, the afterwards celebrated opera-bouffe actress.

We have pleasure in stating that it is proposed to form an Orchestral Society for Wood Green and the neighbourhood. Amateurs willing to join are requested to communicate with Mr. James Sullens, 46, Morley Avenue, Noel Park, Wood Green, who will supply all necessary information.

Through an inadvertence, which we regret, the name of Miss Annie Marriott was omitted from the list of artists who took part in the performance of "Israel in Egypt" at the Handel Festival. To Miss Marriott was intrusted the important air "Thou did'st blow with thy wind," which received justice at her hands.

An Organ Recital was given at the International Inventions Exhibition, South Kensington, on the 25th ult., by Mr. G. Augustus Holmes, Organist of St. George's, Camberwell. The selections were exceedingly well rendered.

AT St. John's Parish Church, Hackney, E., a short Organ Recital is given every Sunday evening before the Service, by the Organist, Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., commencing at 6.30.

MR. W. G. CUSINS, Master of the Music to Her Majesty the Queen, has been appointed a Professor of the Pianoforte at the Guildhall School of Music, in place of the late Sir Julius Benedict.

A SUM of money and large album have recently been presented to Mr. Penney, Organist at Cambridge Heath Church for 16 years, on his resigning that post for another appointment.

Mr. W. G. Forington has been appointed principal bass to the Temple Church.

REVIEWS.

Queen Aimée; or, The Maiden's Crown. The Poetry written by Jetty Vogel. The Music composed by Ebenezer Prout. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE theme of this Cantata is thus briefly told: "The maidens, having sought early on May morning for flowers wherewith to crown their May-day queen, discuss, whilst weaving their wreaths, on whom the choice shall fall. A sign is indicated, which betokens the rightful sovereign, and her comrades, recognising that one among their number pre-eminently fulfils these conditions, elect her with acclamations to the vacant throne." Mr. Prout has proved throughout this work that it is perfectly possible to be light without being trivial; and that the signs of ripe musicianship can be unmistakably displayed without pedantically obtruding them. His Cantata is composed for a soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto, with chorus of female voices and pianoforte accompaniment; this accompaniment, however, so obviously indicating orchestral instrumentation in many parts as to make us hope that he may some day be induced to score it. All the movements, though written with appropriate simplicity, are carefully thought out, a well-marked design in each materially aiding their interest to a musically-trained listener. No. 1, is a Trio, preceded by a short instrumental Prelude. title of this melodious little piece, "The Nest in the May Bush," is sufficiently indicative of its character, one striking change of key, however, from A major to C major, arrest ing the attention just in time to prevent the feeling of monotony, which too often creeps in whilst listening to the even flow of three female voices. A waltz-like movement for the choir, "We have been to the Woodland," succeeds this, and here we have a beautiful modulation, from F to D flat, the tonic of the former key being held on to form the third of the latter. At this point, commenced by the altos, answered by the second, and afterwards by the first sopranos. the voices then uniting, a most melodious phrase occurs, a change to the original key and theme bringing this number to a highly effective conclusion. A Choral Recitative and an air for mezzo-soprano, preceded by a Recitative, may be commended as really good and appropriate music, the strain in which the legend of the golden apple in the hand of Paris is related being extremely vocal and attractive. In the duet for soprano and contralto, "Silent aye is Beauty's claim," some bold changes of key are introduced, the words being sympathetically coloured throughout; indeed, we think vocalists will pronounce this the most effective number in the work. A well written choral piece, "Who is the chosen the garland to wear"? is succeeded by a short solo for contralto, in which the one who shall receive the garland is described; and the Cantata concludes with a chorus and trio, "'Tis Aimée, beloved," the three solo voices continuing to the end, sometimes independently and sometimes in combination with the choir. The words of this Cantata are admirably adapted for music, and we have little doubt that the work will speedily become a favourite with the numerous ladies' choirs ready to welcome meritorious novelties.

The Martyrdom of St. Polycarp. A Sacred Oratorio. By the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart. 8vo, Vocal Score. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE bright and tuneful march from this oratorio is one of the most popular organ pieces in existence, but the work as a whole has been sadly and most undeservedly neglected. The reason for this is that it has only just been published in vocal score, and we are confident that, now it is available in this cheap and handy form, choral societies will quickly recognise its conspicuous merits.

"St. Polycarp" was composed as far back as 1854, as an exercise for the degree of Mus. Doc., and this circumstance may lead to the supposition that it is a dry and scholastic work with none of the qualities which appeal to a popular audience. The facts are very much the other way. libretto is simple, but by no means wanting in dramatic interest. Roman soldiers, having discovered the retreat of the Saint near Smyrna, come to drag him before the Pro-Consul, who offers him his life if he will curse Jesus of Nazareth. He refuses, and proclaims his faith, and is forthwith taken to the stake. There is a vigo-rous overture in orthodox form, after which the first important number is a contralto solo, "Fear none of these things," full of dignified melody and expressiveness. The soldiers arrive to the strains of the march, which is followed by a charming and pathetic air for the principal character, "Yet let me pray." After a spirited double character, "ret let me pray." After a spirited double chorus of pagans, "Destroy the foes of the gods," we come to the most important number of the work, a duet between the proconsul and his unyielding victim. This is carried out at considerable length, and with much knowledge of effect. The peroration, where the saint alone speaks, is especially striking, and on the same level of excellence, though in different degree, is the double chorus of pagans and Christians, with a fugue in eight parts. The last air for St. Polycarp, and the succeeding chorus with its orchestral sequel, descriptive of the matyrdom, contain many fine points, and the final chorus "In the sight of the unwise" brings the oratorio to an effective conclusion. The general style of the music is a happy blending of Handelian dignity with Mendelssohnian grace and refinement, and here and there a trace of Mozart and of Spohr. The brevity of the work is one of its recommendations, as it will only occupy about half of an average Concert programme.

Overture in C ("In Memoriam") for Orchestra. Composed by Arthur Sullivan. Pianoforte arrangement by Myles B. Foster. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THAT this Overture, written in memory of his father, is one of Sir Arthur Sullivan's best works, we believe, is almost universally admitted; and the many admirers of the composition when heard with the orchestra will therefore be gratified to learn that in the two excellent arrangements for the pianoforte now published—one as a solo, and the and this is no mean praise in these ambitious times.

other for four hands-the original effects are admirably preserved; for not only are the passages most skilfully transcribed, both in the solo and duet form, but the salient points in the orchestration are indicated throughout. may say that this is the first time the Overture has been printed, and that very shortly the full score will also be published. It is a good sign of the times when we find the works of English composers obtain so firm a hold of the public as to justify a publisher in putting forth two pianoforte transcriptions of an Overture, and following these by the full score. It does not require a very long memory to recall the day when such a proceeding would have been considered madness.

Childhood's Hours. Twelve characteristic pieces for the Pianoforte. By A. Loeschhorn. [Edwin Ashdown.]

EVEN children in the present day cannot complain that they are not supplied with "programme music." Fanciful titles, such as Schumann gives to his charming little "Kinderscenen," are, of course, difficult to realise in sound; but they create an interest in young realise in sound; but they create an interest in young players, and music of this kind should, therefore, be cordially welcomed. The twelve pieces before us are extremely well written, and we commend them to the notice of juvenile pianists. "Once upon a time," "Entreaty," "The Cuckoo"—the call of which perplexing bird, by the way, is here represented by a major third—"Cradle Song," "The little Soldier," and "Good night" are extremely attractive; but many players will, depthiles prefer others to those we have remade. One doubtless, prefer others to those we have named. One important characteristic in these sketches is that the left hand is not made unduly subordinate to the right; and we may also say that the passages will never distress little fingers.

Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Pianoforte Albuns. Edited by Berthold Tours. Volume V. Compositions by H. A. Wollenhaupt. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

SEVERAL of the pianoforte works of this composer have already won their way to favour in this country, and, although all these will be found in the volume before us, a large number comparatively unknown are also included in the collection, which contains thirty numbers. Wollenhaupt's graceful and vivacious dance-music needs no recommendation from us; but those not familiar with his compositions of another character will be charmed with such sketches as "Florinda," "Pensez-à moi," "Papillon," "Feu Follet," and "L'Inquiétude," all of which, though not requiring the highest executive powers, demand a refined touch and poetical feeling for their due rendering. Apart from their attractive quality to listeners, pianists will find in these pieces many excellent studies for phrasing and accent.

Ten Easy Pieces, for Pianoforte Duet. By Carl Reinecke, [Forsyth Brothers.]

As these pieces are published separately for violin and pianoforte, and in both forms are said to be "arranged by the author," we know not which was the original; but as attractive little sketches, as well as excellent studies, they will be found most valuable for young pupils on both instruments. Much of Carl Reinecke's music especially written for juvenile pianists is already known in this country, and we are glad to find that he is still adding to the store. All who have the training of the musical taste of the rising generation should do their utmost to encourage the spread of pieces written on the lines adhered to by the older composers; for when mere showy display is aimed at in early practice, there can be little chance in after years of any true appreciation of the higher forms of the art.

Romanza, for Violin; with accompaniment for Pianoforte and Harmonium, ad lib. By D. R. Munro. [Brighton: J. and W. Chester.]

Any student of the violin who wishes to escape from the Any student of the violin who wishes to escape from the instruction book and play a "piece" cannot do better than possess himself of Mr. Munro's graceful little Romance. Perhaps the simplicity of the melody might have been agreeably relieved by some variety in the harmony; but what is attempted is effectually accomplished, There is nought on earth so fair. Aria from "Peasant's" Comic Cantata. Composed by John Sebastian Bach. Words by Mrs. William Newton. Edited by Samuel Reay. [Weekes and Co.]

In our notice upon Bach's Peasant's Comic Cantata some time since, we said "The soprano solo 'There is nought on earth so fair' is so striking that we cannot but wonder that we never hear it in the Concert-room." As this remark is printed on the title-page of the song, we may confidently hope that our review has led to the publication of one at least of the numerous gems which have been so long hidden in these forgotten works, for the resuscitation of which we are indebted to Mr. Samuel Reay. We earnestly trust that, now these caskets are opened, their contents may become known to all who respect the name of Bach; for we can assure them that we have only drawn attention to one amongst many which are thoroughly worth preserving.

Come, my soul. Anthem. Words by W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac. Music by G. C. Martin, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This anthem, forming No. 283 of Novello's Octavo Series, would claim attention if only on account of the words being original, and not, as in nearly all instances, selected from Holy Writ. But the music is almost equally removed from the conventional style. It opens with a vague and mysterious symphony, leading to the first enunciation of the principal theme, a phrase in A minor, given out by the tenor and imitated by the other voices. The general manner is a curious mixture of the archaic and the modern, effective in its way, though a little confusing at first. After the opening the voices move together, either in solid harmony or unison, and the anthem is therefore not difficult, while its freshness and vigour will find it plenty of admirers.

Songs for Little Ones. Words by F. A. R. Music by Merelina Gepp. [Weekes and Co.]

"LITTLE ones" at all musically inclined will certainly welcome this elegant volume, containing twelve songs most beautifully illustrated by C. L. Hardcastle. The words are as simple and healthy as the music; and vocalists in the nursery should feel themselves highly honoured by the publication of such a pleasing offering for their holiday moments.

A Sunny Beam; A red, red rose; Wanderer's Song; Evening Song. By R. Schumann. Arranged by G. F. Grover. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE pieces, forming Nos. 511 to 514 of "Novello's Part-Song Book," are arrangements from the composer's Lieder. Whether there is any justification for this method of treatment is a point on which musicians are not likely to agree. But all must admit the effectiveness of these beautiful little gems in their present form, and the skill with which Mr. Grover has accomplished his work of transcription.

Romance for the Pianoforte. By Henry Charles Banister.
[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

This unpretentious little pianoforte Sketch should be welcomed by all who are attracted rather by the delicate and refined treatment of a simple theme than by a display of scholastic profundity, especially when the composer has already proved his power to grapple with music of a severer style. The passages lie throughout most gratefully under the hands; and apart from its intrinsic merit, the piece will be found an excellent study for touch.

Merry Little Songs for Merry Little Folk. Written by L. H. F. Du Terreaux. Music arranged by Alberto Randegger. [Joseph Williams.]

An excellent collection of pleasing and simple melodies, arranged with appropriately easy accompaniments, and set to "merry" words for children. "The Christmas Tree," "The Cuckoo" (in which, by the way, the bird's call is a minor third), "Wonderland," "The Stubborn Fox," and "The King's Feast," are exceedingly attractive little ditties.

Three Canons, Concert Fantasia and Fugue. By W. G. Wood. Nos. 14 and 47 of "Original Compositions for the Organ." [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Woon's Canons are "two in one in the octave," with an independent pedal part. This device materially simplifies the task of writing a canon, but the old masters would have scouted it as unscientific. Now-a-days, however, the production of effect is the one thing sought after by composers, a display of scholasticism for its own sake being regarded as mere pedantry. Judged from this standpoint, Mr. Wood's pieces may be commended, especially No. 3, in which the lower canonic part follows the upper at the interval of a crotchet. The Fantasia commences with a spirited movement in C minor, leading to a melodious and extremely well-written Andante in the relative major. The Fugue, in C major, is based on a bright and well-marked subject, and is worked out with much vigour, the peroration being especially effective. If a little too secular for church use, the work would prove a welcome item in a recital programme.

Order for a Flower Service. By Rev. W. H. C. Malton, B.A. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE music to the "Antient Carol" contained in this sort Service demands a word of commendation, as being appropriately fitted to the words. We may also say that the directions for conducting the Service are well considered.

Transcriptions from the Works of Mendelssohn. For the Organ. By George Calkin. Book 4.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This book contains a considerable portion of the 42nd Psalm, arranged in such a manner as to be within the means of even elementary players. Of course a transcription of this nature does not convey a full idea of the beauty of the original work, but, in its modest way, it is well done.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THERE is every prospect of Wagner's "Lohengrin" being performed for the first time before a Paris audience during the coming winter season at the Opéra Comique, the proprietor, M. Carvalho (a personal friend of the late poet-composer), having acquired the right of performance from the widow. M. Carvalho, however, though courageously entering upon the venture has (as appears from a letter recently addressed by him to the Paris Le Matin) serious misgivings as to the ultimate success of the undertaking. After all that has been said in these columns respecting the existing antagonism against Wagner's music in France, and especially against the performance of an entire work by that composer, it is needless to point out the otherwise incomprehensible fact that M. Carvalho should be running a serious risk, from a theatrical manager's point of view, in presenting one of the operatic masterpieces of all ages to his countrymen. There is the political, or "patriotic," antagonism militating against his undertaking generally; there is, moreover, the antagonism of the leading musical press refusing to countenance even its fair trial on national artistic grounds. Surely, the resolution arrived at by M. Carvalho amounts to an heroic one! Nevertheless we, who have followed the drift of the musical current in the French capital, with an especial eye to that modern phase of the development of the art which, rightly or wrongly, culminates in our opinion in the works of Richard Wagner, venture to predict a decided success to M. Carvalho's "Lohengrin" performances, which will prove the forerunner of the same master's "Meistersinger" and "Tristan und Isolde," under similar auspices.

A commemorative tablet, bearing the following inscription, has just been placed against the house at Côte St. André (Isère), where Berlioz was born—viz., "In memory of Hector Berlioz, born in this house on December 11, 1803, erected by his countrymen, equally proud of his genius and of his fame." Poor Berlioz! In reading the above sentiment one cannot help remembering the contemptuous way in which his genius was treated by his own countrymen during his lifetime, and how little they heeded the first indications of his growing fame outside of France. The Grand Priz de Rome of the Paris Conservatoire,

The Grand Prix de Rome of the Paris Conservatoire, for the composition of a cantata, has been awarded this year to M. Leroux, a pupil of M. Massenet. The jury consisted of MM. A. Thomas, Gounod, Reyer, Massenet, Saint-Saëns, Leo Délibes, Guiraud, Dubois, and B. Godard. For the first time for a very long period the chief prize for singing at the Paris Conservatoire has been gained by a young English lady, Miss Moore. The last English-woman so distinguished was Miss Augusta Thompson.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik revives the tenour of an affiche which Richard Wagner had caused to be posted up in the dressing-rooms of his faithful executive artists, on the very eve of the famous first performance of "Der Ring the very eve of the famous inst periorinance of Der King des Nibelungen," in 1876, at Bayreuth. Owing to its ephemeral character, and the subsequent excitement attending the performances, scarcely a copy of the placard had been preserved to hand down to posterity a most touching instance of a great artist's solicitude for his art, and, at the same time, of the grandly naïve good feeling which the master had succeeded in establishing between himself and his exponents-an achievement probably as rare in matters operatic as the stray copies which may have been preserved of the document to which we refer, and which runs as follows: "Final entreaty to my dear co-workers-Distinctness! The big notes will take care of themselves; the small notes and the words to which they belong mainly depend on you. Never address the audience, but rather those around you; when you are soliloquising let your looks be to the ground or else above you, never straight before you. Last wish:
Preserve me your love, you dear ones! Bayreuth, August 13, 1876, Richard Wagner." We have given as literal a translation as possible of this characteristic document, which will thus best speak for itself, and will serve, in a measure, to explain the extraordinary devotion which its author inspired in the numerous "co-workers" of that particular phase of his art whereof he remains as yet the sole representative. Crude as the above sentences, or at least the didactic portion thereof, certainly are, they almost remind us in their pithiness of Hamlet's famous advice to the poor player. For, brief and incomplete though they be, they undoubtedly are to the purpose, and the wonder only is that similar admonitions of an elementary character should be required, as they undoubtedly are, to be administered to the great majority of dramatic singers, or "artists," at present treading the lyrical stage.

The members of the Berlin Royal Dom-Choir are projecting a Concert tour during the coming autumn in the principal towns of Southern Germany. The Philharmonic orchestra of the same capital is already engaged upon a similar undertaking under the auspices of its present Conductor, Professor Franz Mannstaedt. The undoubtedly growing tendency among musical organisations of acknowledged superiority to become migratory during a portion of the year is a sign of the times which should be welcomed by all amateurs, not only as maintaining a desirable rapport between the executive elements of the North and South of a politically united country, but also in establishing eventually an interchange of national aspirations and idiosyncracies in this direction, whereof a beginning has already been made at the world's "great fairs," as our International Exhibitions have been aptly called, and which cannot fail to prove beneficial to an art which is essentially cosmopolitan.

An entire performance of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" is contemplated, at the beginning of next month, at the Munich Hof-Theater; while a chronological representation of the entire works of the same composer (with the exception of "Parsifal") is announced to take place at Frankfurt in December next, Fraulein Malten and Herr Gudehus being amongst the principal supporters of the scheme.

Weber's resuscitated early opera "Sylvana," aided by a new libretto and musical amplifications from other works of the composer, continues to find much favour with German audiences. After being most successfully brought out, as our readers will remember, during the season just closed, at Hamburg, the interesting undertaking was repeated with equal success at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, and the work has also recently been repeatedly performed at Mannheim, under the direction of Herr Langer, the skilful adapter of the additions to the score of "Sylvana" above referred to.

Commemorative tablets, relating to events not always of the first importance, are multiplying abroad. One has just been added to a house at Währing, near Vienna, the inscription whereof runs as follows: "Franz Schubert inscription whereof runs as follows: "Franz Schubert composed in the garden of this house (then known as the inn 'Zum Biersack') in July, 1826, on a Sunday evening, in company with some friends and amidst the general noisiness of the locality, his Ständchen, 'Horch, Horch! Die Lerch im Aetherblau.'" Thus the great song-writer, by one of his finest inspirations, has immortalised the "Beer-sack" and the fact, from its present owner's point of view, was, of course, well worth recording.

It will doubtless interest many of our readers to learn that Herr Robert Franz, the well-known composer of German Lieder (to the celebration of whose seventieth birthday we alluded in our June number), has just published, under the title of "Albumblatt," his first composition for the pianoforte.

At a recent gathering of organists at Berlin, Herr Otto Dienel delivered an interesting discourse on English organs, and organ music, with special regard to the instruments at the Inventions Exhibition at South Kensington.

Max Bruch's new Oratorio, "Achilles," met with a very favourable reception upon its recent performance at the Bonn Festival, notwithstanding the undue length from which the work is said somewhat to suffer.

A rare celebration—that of the seventieth anniversary of his active connection with a leading art-institution-has just fallen to the share of Capellmeister Louis Schlæsser, of the Darmstadt Hof-Theater, which establishment he entered as an orchestral member on June 18, 1815. The veteran conductor, who is also well known as a composer of much merit, cherishes personal reminiscences of nearly every distinguished composer of the present century, from Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, and Cherubini (he having been a pupil of the latter), to Berlioz and Richard Wagner. It is needless to say that on the occasion in question Herr Schlæsser was the recipient of numerous tokens of the esteem in which he is held, both in his own country and elsewhere. We may add that, notwithstanding his eighty-five years, the Maëstro (as witness his article on "The Rose of Sharon," of which we gave a resumé in our last number) still follows the musical current of the day with undiminished attention and sympathy, wielding an able literary pen in the best interests of the art to which his whole life has been devoted. Long may he continue to do

At a Festival Concert recently given in connection with the musical section of the Berlin Royal Academy of Arts, the programme included a performance of a pianoforte trio by our countryman Mr. George Bennett, which was well received. The executants were Miss Emily Shinner, Herren Berger and Koch.

Wagner's "Siegfried," forming part of his Tetralogy
"Der Ring des Nibelungen," is at last to be performed at the Berlin Opera during next season, so that the production here of the entire work, which has already made the round of other leading establishments in the fatherland, may be looked for eventually by the frequenters of the royal institution in question, who, thus far, have shown admirable patience with the tardy recognition of Wagner's genius on the part of the managing director, Herr von

The third number of the new Musical Quarterly, issued under the auspices of Herr Chrysander and Professor Spitta, contains an interesting article on "Musik-Psychologie in England," by C. Stumpf, an additional paper on "Speronte's Singende Muse," from the pen of Herr Spitta, and some able critical observations on "Antonio Vivaldi's Violin Concerte," by Paul Graf Waldersee. To judge from the general solidity of its contents, the new journal bids fair to obtain ere long the leading position in matters musical at which it aims.

An opera (as yet unpublished), from the pen of the Russian composer, M. Solowieff, and entitled "Cordelia," is in active preparation at the Imperial Opera of Vienna, and will be brought out during the coming season.

Subscriptions are being raised in Germany for the erection of a monument to Robert Schumann at his native place, Zwickau.

The eighth Congress of the Association of German Zither Players (an instrument scarcely, as yet, recognised as a musical one, properly so-called, and for obvious reasons holding no place in the orchestral combination) will take place towards the end of this month at Dresden. Of the upwards of one hundred societies devoted to the cultivation of this most unobtrusive, perhaps, of all musical instruments, forty belong to the Association in question, whose boast may not unreasonably be that neither its tyrostudents nor its expert practitioners will ever interfere with the comfort or the occupation of their fellow-creatures. Thus the cultivation of the zither (to the musical merits of which instrument another "note" will be devoted in our next number) affords an opportunity for quiet enjoyment of individual musical effort which we should be the last to grudge any one. We say advisedly the quiet enjoyment, because the noisy abuse of the favourite modern instrument, the pianoforte, as daily practised around us, precludes the idea of enjoyment, in a musical sense, on the part of the performer, while it inflicts the tortures of purgatory upon the ears of the enforced listener. Let the Zither Society flourish, then, if only from this comparatively negative point of view.

An important and interesting manuscript by Franz Schubert has just been brought to light by that indefatigable explorer of similar treasures connected with that composer, Herr Friedländer. We refer to the setting of Goethe's early dramatic work "Claudine von Villa Bella," as an opera. Only the first act, however, has been found, the second and last having, it is surmised, been lost in a

Among the pamphlets published in Germany in connection with the bi-centenary of Handel are three papers by Julius Otto Opel, entitled "Die Hofoper unter dem Administrator Herzog August in Halle," "Der Kammerdiener Georg Handel und sein Sohn Georg Friedrich," and "Die Hallischen Häuser der Familie des Tondichters Handel." All are full of curious details, and deserve attention.

Ole Bull's famous violin has recently come into the possession of an amateur, the Baron von Creytz, who acquired the relic at an auction in Brussels for the sum of 4,000 francs. This interesting instrument was the work of Gasparo di Salo, and its finely carved neck is attributed to the hand of none other than Benvenuto Cellini himself.

M. Gevaert, the principal of the Brussels Conservatoire, has been appointed first artistic Director of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, in which new capacity he has ordered that all the members of the orchestra, including those of many years standing, shall be subjected to a trial of their skill at the Conservatoire previous to the renewal of their present engagements. The reasons which have led to the adoption of so rigorous a measure have not transpired.

Herr Eduard Strauss and his famous orchestra will shortly proceed to Antwerp to fulfil an engagement at the International Exhibition now being held there.

A musical congress will meet at the beginning of this month at Antwerp, to discuss questions connected with musical copyright, and the historical, philosophical, and educational aspects of the art.

The German Opera in New York will, according to its present intentions, undertake the production, amongst others, of the following music-dramas by Richard Wagner, nerian conductor, has been engaged for the projected performances.

The theatre La Scala, of Milan, will, it is announced, inaugurate its coming season with a performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

At Bari (Italy), his native town, died, on the 7th ult., Nicola de Giosa, a successful composer of numerous operas and an excellent orchestral conductor, in which latter capacity he was engaged at various times at the San Carlo Theatre of Naples, the Fenice of Venice, and other leading Italian establishments. De Giosa was a pupil, at the Naples Conservatorio, of Zingarelli and Donizetti, and had just completed his sixty-fifth year.

HANDEL'S DOUBLE CONCERTO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-As both the Handel Bi-Centenary Festival Programme and the piano score of the "Selection," published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., are extremely misleading in regard to the Double Concerto, included in the "Selection," and as you seem to have been misled by them in some particulars, I have thought that the following notice of the Concerto, written by Mr. W. S. Rockstro, who discovered the work for its performance in Glasgow in rebruary last, might interest you, and, if you see fit to publish it, or part of it, your readers. The following appeared in the programme of the last Subscription Concert for Season 1884-85, on February 12 of this year—the programme on that evening consisting of miscellaneous selections from Handel's works:-"Concerto for Two-Orchestras (first performance)."

"Among the MSS. in the handwriting of George Frederic Handel, preserved in the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace, is a Double Concerto, written on an exceptionally grand scale, and, in many respects, more than ordinarily interesting.

"The autograph copy of this newly discovered work is contained in a volume labelled 'Sketches'-a strangely inadequate title, since it includes two complete choral settings of 'How beautiful are the feet,' added to 'The Messiah' after its first performance, and some other very important compositions. The piece in question, unhappily not quite complete, is placed near the end of the volume, and seems to have been first noticed by M. Schælcher, who mistook it for an indication of 'Additional Accompaniments' to 'The Messiah' (Schoelcher's 'Life of Handel,' p. 139). Dr. Chrysander also made a passing allusion to it in the, as yet, incomplete third volume of his Biography, and it was afterwards more minutely described by the writer of the present notice, who, while collecting the materials for a new 'Life of Handel' (London: Macmillan & Co., 1883), discovered a curious connection between some of its movements and those contained in another MS. volume, also in Handel's handwriting, now in the British Museum. By carefully collating these two MSS, the writer was enabled to restore the missing portions with sufficient certainty to leave no reasonable doubt that the form in which it is now, for the first time, presented to the public, is that in which it was originally completed by Handel. The style of the handwriting, the watermark on the paper, and other significant facts, lead to the irresistible conclusion that the Concerto was composed very nearly at the same time as 'The Messiah,' in all probability between the years 1740 and 1745. It consists-in its complete form-of twelve movements, of which nine are contained in the MS. at Buckingham Palace. These movements are scored for two concertini, each consisting of two hautboys, two horns in F, and one bassoon; and an accompanying Concerto grosse, consisting of two violins, viola, violoncello, and contra-basso. The movements are headed as follows :-

"1. Pomposo; 2. Allegro; 3. A tempo giusto; 4. Largo; 5. Allegro ma non troppo; 6. A tempo ordinario; 7. Andante Larghetto; 8. Allegro; 9. Allegro; 10. Adagio; 11. Allegro ma non troppo; 12. March. "The A tempo givisto, marked No. 3, is an instrumental rendering of the chorus 'Lift up your heads,' and hence M. Schælcher's suggestion that the parts for the hautboys and horns were intended to serve as 'additional accom-paniments' to 'The Messiah.' One bar only of the Allegro ma non troppo, No. 9, is in the MS. at Buckingham Palace. For the remainder of this movement and the whole of those which follow we are indebted to the MS. now in the British Museum, and to an Organ Concerto published by Dr. Arnold. The concluding March corresponds with that in 'Judas Maccabæus.'

"The work will be performed from a transcript, made by her Majesty's gracious permission, from the original autograph, the missing portion being supplied from the restored copy already described.—W. S. R.

"As the Concerto is too long for performance on this eccasion, only the movements Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 will be given."

A comparison of the tempo marks of the above movements with Novello, Ewer and Co's score of the Concerto as played at the Festival will show that these (1, 2, 4, 5, and 6) are the "five movements" which you speak of the Concerto as containing. I believe that Mr. Rockstro, since writing the above, has altered his opinion about the last part of the Concerto, and now believes it to end with the ninth movement. As there is a very general, and, in the circumstances, almost inevitable misunderstanding about this interesting work, I thought, having the above notes beside me, I could not do better than in this way try to rectify it as far as I could.

I remain, Sir, yours &c., JOHN D. SINCLAIR. Langside, July 4, 1885.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE ON MACKENZIE'S "ROSE OF SHARON."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Will the Editor of THE MUSICAL TIMES permit an American admirer of Mr. Mackenzie a word of correction in the interest of truth and fair play? I have the honour to be the writer of the musical reviews in The New York Tribune, and am responsible for the opinion on "The Rose of Sharon" expressed in that journal. That opinion, as well as others which preceded it, published a sincere appreciation of the meritorious work which Mr. Mackenzie has done and of honest delight in what Mr. Bennett calls "the rising artistic fortunes" of Great Britain. I therefore feel justified in protesting against the injustice of Mr. Bennett's criticism of my review of "The Rose of Sharon" in THE MUSICAL TIMES, not because I expected him to agree with me, but because he distorted my statement in order to hang a criticism on it. See THE MUSICAL TIMES for June. I coupled the observation that Mr. Mackenzie did not seem able to maintain himself on "an even plane of excellence," with the additional phrase, "or in one style of writing," and then added that at times his writing was as old-fashioned as Handel's, at others as modern as Liszt's. Mr. Bennett omitted the line I have italicised from his quotation, and then sought to discredit my common sense by saying that I used the comparison as referring to excellence, and did not say whether the drop was from Liszt to Handel, or from Handel to Liszt. Had Mr. Bennett not resorted to the most undignified and unpardonable of all tricks of criticism, the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES would have known that the comparison in question went only to the style of writing; but Mr. Bennett would not have made the point at which he aimed. I write this in the country, away from my files, but Mr. Bennett has the review and can correct me if I am in error. With much respect, H. E. KREHBIEL.

Rockland, Maine, July 11, 1885.

The Editor of THE MUSICAL TIMES has been good enough to show me the foregoing letter. I am too old a hand at journalistic give and take not to appreciate the writer's move to a position of virtuous indignation on a side The device is feminine, but "'twill serve." rest, I have only two remarks:—First, if Mr. Krehbiel chooses to assume that I wilfully misrepresented him for the purpose of making a point, by all means let him do so. Second, I do not see how he benefits by calling attention to his belief that "The Rose of Sharon" contains music in any sense suggestive of Liszt and Handel. The English public, who know Mr. Mackenzie's work, will recognise here a "curiosity of criticism" without any aid from me. J. B.]

MUSICAL DEGREES.

SIR,-One of your correspondents speaks of Musical Degrees as being intended primarily for the benefit of professional musicians, and for the security of the public who engage their services.

The University degrees do not answer to this description, and it is impossible they can do so unless the scope of the examination be very much altered. For what does the professional musician, on the one hand, and the public, on the other, require? Primarily they need some certificate of executive skill and teaching ability; the latter even more than the former.

Now the University degrees are granted for knowledge of musical theory exclusively, and are, perhaps, the best certificate for proficiency in that department that can be obtained, but have no concern with ability in other directions.

A man may be a good teacher and player of several instruments in addition to being a Mus. Bac. or Mus. Doc., but obviously the holding of a purely theoretical degree can have little to do with it.

A musician desirous of teaching mainly the theory of music would naturally be anxious to obtain a theoretical degree as the best testimonial that he possessed the necessary knowledge. But to the majority of musicians studying and teaching music practically through the medium of voice or instrument, with the assistance (necessary in every case) of a certain amount of theory, the degree would be of very little value as a testimonial because it does not relate to what more than 90 out of every 100 students require. It would be very difficult, though perhaps possible, to institute some examination that should testify to the possession of the requisite knowledge in the different technical departments of music. Would this, however, guide the public in the search after a good teacher? Assuredly not entirely. Many varied qualities go to the making of a competent teacher of anything besides the requisite knowledge. I know of no examination, and can conceive of none, the result of which by separating the good teachers from the bad shall be a safeguard to the profession and a guide to the public.

To use a very homely proverb, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating," and the only entirely satisfactory testimonial a good teacher can have is good work done—a good average of successful pupils. Of such a testimonial the public are becoming every day better able to judge.

I recognise the hardship of the University statute which virtually says: " Not all those who are musically qualified shall be allowed to take a Degree, but only such of the number as can in addition pass an examination in Greek, Latin, Arithmetic, and Euclid"; but I offer the foregoing observations to show that unless the examination is greatly altered it will remain a subject of only minor importance to the great majority of the profession.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, H. M. S.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES,"

Sir,-As a Graduate in Music by examination at Dublin University will you permit me, through the medium of your widely-read paper, to inform "Quero Justitiam," and others whom it may concern, that, at this University, Greek is no longer a language in which it is compulsory for a candidate to pass as part of his literary examination previous to that for the degree of Bachelor in Music; and what "Quæro Justitiam" suggests as an examination to be established as a "concession" to the musical profession -viz., "A fair examination in two languages besides his own (say, Latin and French), in the first two books of Euclid and the elements of Algebra"—is almost exactly what is now required at Trinity College, Dublin, of intending Graduates in Music; in fact, arithmetic is the only addition to it; and as to his suggestion that "In a few days after the literary examination he shall pass the ordinary musical examination for the Bachelor's degree," I know several men who have done this, commencing on the next day after their literary entrance or preliminary examination. Another very great advantage, particularly to men already comparatively advanced in life, attaches to graduating at Dublin—viz., that as stated in the Dublin University Calendar, "When the time at which a higher degree can Bachelor's degree in any faculty, the meaning of the rule is that the time may be reckoned from the date at which, according to the Laws and Statutes of the University, the degree of Bachelor might have been taken. With this condition the inferior and superior degree may be taken on the same day." I can testify that this is really so, having availed myself of this privilege by taking the two degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music on the same day; of course, after passing the required examinations, and giving the public performance still deemed necessary to prove that a man is a good musician (theoretically and practically) at the University of Dublin. I hope this requirement will always be enforced as the best possible guarantee that a Graduate in Music is really a sound and able musician. At Cambridge there is no stipulation as to the time to elapse between the two degrees being taken by examination. At Oxford and at London there are regulations as to time to elapse between the various examinations for degrees in music, but obviously those who do not wish to wait may select either of the other two Universities. It thus appears that really capable men who desire to take a degree in music, need not seek it by any other than the honourable means of graduating by examination at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, or London.

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

Mus. Doc., T.C.D.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I should be obliged by your giving me the advantage of your valuable pages to make a few remarks on "Musical Examinations," which is the subject also of both a leaderette and letter in your last (June) issue. You say that musical examinations do good, and your correspondent finds fault with them on certain heads. To a certain extent I agree with you, Sir, that they do good, but I think the good done is very little. At the same time, I agree with many of your correspondents' remarks, especially as regards the five years necessary to have run between one's taking the Bachelor's and Doctor's degrees.

I will, at present, confine my remarks to the examinations for University Degrees in music.

If a student, anxious to graduate in music at any of the Universities, places himself with any of those who lay themselves out as "coaches" for these examinations, he will be told that if he writes an exercise having no glaring faults in it, and does his counterpoint paper well at the examination, he is pretty certain to get through. Now it is of the counterpoint, as required at the Universities, that I most complain.

It is about 300 years since Monteverde set all the musical world agog by his innovations in the use of discords. The line then struck by him has been carried further and further ever since, until now almost anything is allowed, and composers are always aiming at new progressions. This is the case everywhere except at the University Musical Examinations. There they tie you down to, and lay very considerable stress on, a style of music which composers have been trying to avoid for three centuries! Counterpoint would be of the greatest good, if the present system of chords, &c., was allowed. But no! They compel you to keep to the old tonality, and you are only allowed to use two chords, and not allowed to skip a major sixth, and other absurdities. And yet this is said to be a progressive age we live in!

I am far from objecting to a young student going through a course of counterpoint, even in the strict style (for the same reason as we study the history of past events), but to have to work up to the pitch required by the examiners is a great waste of time. More than this, I think it has a decided tendency to cramp his treatment of original ideas afterwards, making him look at them all from a contrapuntal point of view, three hundred years old at

These remarks (which are applicable also to the subject of canonic writing) touch more nearly the examination for we are told, "in really good style, as a work of art."

May I ask, sir, if you or any of your readers can point out to me one doctor's exercise, written for any of our University examinations, which is worthy of filling a niche in the temple of art? And why? Not because many of those who have passed the examination have not been able to produce a "work of art," but because they are so tied down by rules and restrictions, that their productions have no chance of becoming "works of art," and are, in consequence, well named "exercises."

Finally, if our University musical degrees are of the standing they ought to be, why have such men as Sullivan,* Stanford,* Mackenzie, Cowen, &c. (who may be said to represent music in England), not availed themselves of such degrees ?

should like to say much more on the subject, but I think I have brought forward some good reasons for contending that the present style of musical examinations at our Universities, only does a minimum of good, and does absolutely nothing towards aiding and furthering art.

P.S.—It has been suggested to me by a friend to add, for obvious reasons, that I have not been a candidate, unsuccessful or otherwise, for any musical degree.

Yours, &c.,

CATHEDRAL OFFICERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—We (the Lay Vicars of the Cathedrals of this country) are particularly obliged to you for the courtesy exhibited in allowing the expression of opinion from the different Cathedrals to appear in your valued columns. Speaking personally, as one having had experience in three of our Cathedrals, I wish to say that to a considerable extent the present position of Lay Vicars has been brought upon them by their own actions and inaction. For many years, the conduct of those who composed our choirs was a subject of reproach by all who took interest in our Cathedrals and their services. Men were appointed who had the misfortune to have a voice, irrespective of education in other respects, or even as to the cultivation or production of the voice itself. Of course, with such individuals it was easy for educated men-i.e., those forming the Cathedral Clergy-to deal; and, as I have already said, the personal conduct of men of the type referred to, was only what was to be expected. Therefore I say that much of the unfortunate position we now occupy is owing to the two causes mentioned. It is satisfactory however to notice that within the last ten or twelve years there has been a marked improvement both as regards the tone and general bearing of cathedral choirs (of course with exceptions, which only prove the rule), and I am sure it is the wish of all that those who compose our choirs, should at least be able to hold their own with those they come daily in contact with. The inaction to which I referred, was the lost opportunity when the Cathedral Communion was formed, in not joining together as a body from all the Cathedrals in the kingdom, so that our different cases and conditions might be described by, and represented by, a deputation to the Commission, which is now concluding its report. Joint action would at least have commanded attention and perhaps something more.

Is it too much to hope that we may yet be treated as we have a right to expect by the powers that be?

THE INCOMPLETE CHORD OF THE 6-4-3. TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR.-May I be allow to remark upon an inaccuracy constantly to be found in the performance of the works of Handel. In the second inversion of the chord of the dominant seventh, the great master invariably omits the fourth, indeed it may almost be said that he goes out of his way to avoid it, nevertheless, writers of additional accompaniments, organists and others, usually add this objectionable interval, thereby destroying the noble and truly dignified effect of the chord as used by Handel, and also contemporary composers, the addition in question giving a character to the music totally at variance with its sublime simplicity. I cannot ask you to insert the numerous examples I could adduce, but hope by your kind help to obtain the opinions of abler musicians on the subject .- I am, truly yours,

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHEV-DE-LA-ZOUCH.—A very interesting Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church by the Organist, Mr. C. Horn, R.A.M., on the and ult. The organ (bull by Kirkland, of Wakefield and London) has been recently enlarged by the addition of a Gamba stop on the Great, and a Bourdon stop on the Swell, and it is now a very fine instrument, the tone being remarkably brilliant. The programme, which was well rendered, included a Sonata by Mendelsohn, the C. Minor Prelude and Fugue by Bach, the Barcarole from 4th Planoforte Concerto (W. S. Bennett), and an Andante and Allegro (F. E. Bache). An offertory of £5 was collected towards the Organ Fund.

CAPE TOWN.—The annual celebration of the Confession of Augsburg took place in the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Strand Street, on Sunday, June 28. Musical selections were sung by a special choir, under the direction of Mr. J. H. Ashley: Mr. J. B. Smithers officiating as Organist. The selections were as follows: Morning Service; anthem, "Blessed is the man" (Sir John Goss); soil and chorus, "Thou, O God, art full of compassion" (De Monti); solo, "My hope is in the Evertasting," from Stainer's Daughter of Yairus (sung by Mrs. Rosskelly); anthem, "Break forth into joy" (Stainer); Evening Service; anthem, "The earth is the Lord's 'Lowe); recitative and air from Gaul's Holy Octy," These are they that are arrayed in white robes" (sung by Mrs. Rosskelly); anthem, "Blessed be the God and Father" (Dr. S. S. Weeley); anthem, "O praise God in His holiness" (Scarisbrick).

EASTBOURNE.—The seventh season of Mr. Julian Adams's Orchestral Concerts commenced at the Devonahire Park, on June 30, with brilliant success. In every respect Mr. Adams thoroughly maintained the reputation he has gained both as a Conductor and plaints; and there is every reason to believe that the present series of performances will not only equal, but eclipse those which have preceded them. It need scarcely be said that Mr. Adams's reception by the large audience assembled was most enthusiastic assembled was most enthusiastic.

Falkinks.—A very successful Concert by Mr. J. Watson Lee's uppils was given on Friday, June 26, in the Oddfellow's Hall. In the Junior Division the works selected were by Haydn, Beethoven, Clementi, &c. The chief items of interest in the Senior Division were the Overture to Der Freischitts (Weber), for eight hands (two pianos), and harmonium; three movements from the Septet, Op. 20 (fleethoven), for two pianos, and Weber's "Polaca Brillante" in E, all of which were excellently played. "With verdure clad" (Haydn), and "My heart ever faithful" (Bach), were admirably rendered by Miss Brown and Miss Wilson. At the close the Chairman (Rev. James Aitchiason) distributed the certificates from Trinity College, ondon, gained by students at this centre, and also a few prizes.

FOLKESTONE,—Special services were held at the Parish Church, on the 1sth ult., on the occasion of the re-opening of the Sanctuary after its renovation and embellishment. At the evening service the Dettingen Te Deum was performed, Mr. Dugard conducting, and a string band, led by Mr. J. R. C. Roberts, supplementing the organ, at which Miss Daly presided.

GLOUCESTER.—The pupils of Westfield House School gave an Evening Concert in aid of the Free Hospital for children on the 9th 9th. Mendelssohn's music to Racine's Athalie and Sir W. Sterndale ust Mendelssohn's music to Racine's Athalie and Sir W. Sterndale Bened's May Queen, with full orchestral accompaniments, were performed before a large and appreciative audience. The solo vocalists were Misses Katie Thomas, L. Livings, and E. Taylor; Messre. F. Evans and T. Woodward, of the cathedral choir. Mr. J. W. Rippon led the band; Miss Lilian Thomas, R.A.M., presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. John Hunt conducted. Financially and musically the Concert was so great a success that a repetition has been requested.

GRAHAMSTOWN.—The Handel Bi-centenary Festival was held in On the 1st ult., ROBERT EDWARD WEST, Professor of Music, and Organist of the Parish Church, Dawlish, aged 50.

performed, for the first time in South Africa. The solos were well sung by Miss A. Bourke, Miss Wedderburn, Miss Holland, Miss Deer, Miss Davies, Messrs, Erown, Winny, Kay, Pryce and Cred. The choruses were excellently rendered, and the band, led by Mr. Muire, thoroughly efficient. Mr. Winny conducted, Mrs. Espin presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Dixon at the harmonium.

presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Dixon at the harmonium.

LANCINO.—An interesting Invitation Concert was given in the Hall of SS. Mary and Nicholas College, on Thursday, the 9th ult., in aid of the Organ Enlargement Fund. The principal artists were fliss Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Marriott, and Mr. Chas. Charlton, vocalists; harp, Mr. Aptommass, violin, Mr. Brown; Cornet, Mr. A. Programmer Conductor, Inc. Cugger in the Concert. The Choir gave the glees "Sir Knight" (Macirone) and "When Allenadale" (Pearsall), and the Orchestral pieces were the Coverture to Post and Peassant (Suppé), the Allegro from the "Jupiter" Symphony, and the Overture to Don Giovanni. The Concert was a marked success.

the Overture to Don Grovann. The Concert was a marked success.

MARITZBURG.—The members of the Orchestral Society gave a complimentary Concert to Mr. S. Rowlandson, the Honorary Conductor, on Saturday, May 16, when a well selected programme was excellently rendered. A feature of the evening was the performance of Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor, well played by Mrs. T. C. Mitchell. The Natal Glee Club, under the Conductorship of Mr. F. Crane, contributed part-songs, and Mr. Haden played a violin solo. The principal vocalists were Miss Sydney, Mrs. Butt, Mrs. Shepstone, Miss Stanbridge, Mr. Tristram, Mr. Crane, and Mr. J. Harper. Miss M. Molison was an efficient accompanist.

Newcastle-on-Tyne,—The annual Concert and Garden Party in connection with Christ Church was held in the grounds and banqueting-hall of Jesmond Dene on the 1st uit, when a select programme of part-songs, &c., was ably rendered by the Cecilia Quartet (Messrs. F. Jones, T. C. Thompson, J. B. Grant, and A. Nesbit), assisted by Misses Graham and Wake, Master Ascough, and Mr. Gouldy. Mr. R. P. Milburn, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ and pianoforte.

PRUTRICH.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church, by Mr. W. W. Windle, Organist of Belper Church, on Sunday afternoon, the 5th ult, before a large congregation. The choir sang a Processional Hymn, and a short Service was conducted by the Vicar, Rev. W. J. Ledward. Mr. Windle performed works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Wely, Herman, &c.

Pudsey, Leeds.—The Anniversary Services of the Unitarian Church took place on Sunday, the 5th ult., when selections from the works of Sir W. S. Bennett, Henry Farmer, Arthur Pearson, and G. F. Root were given by the choir. Mr. Arthur Pearson presided at the organ throughout the day, and played, as voluntaries, in the morning Pastorale in G. No. 5 (Merkel), Postiude in D (Smart); and in the evening Andante espressivo (Ouseley), and the Final Chorus from Dr. Roberts's Jonah. The music was excellently rendered, and the services well attended.

SHERRORNE.—The eighty-fifth Concert of the School Musical Society took place on the 3rd ult. (Commemoration-Day) at King's School. A varied programme was well readered, the singing being especially good. Mr. Donkin gave a fine performance of the Finale to De Beriot's Seventh Violin Concerto, accompanied on the organ. Mr. Parker conducted, and Mr. H. A. Bullock, Organist, of Yeovil, presided at the organ.

STAFFORD.—An Organ Recital was given in St. Mary's Church, on Monday, June 27, by Dr. Taylor. The programme included compositions by Bach, Mendelssohn, Merkel, Guilmant, and Smart, Miss Eleanor Falkner was the vocalist. There was a large congregation, and all the pieces were thoroughly appreciated.

Wellington, N.Z.—Lloyd's Hero and Leander was given for the first time in Wellington on May 19, at a private Concert of the Harmonic Clob, and the control of Mr. Robert Parker. The theoretic with such enthusiasm that a repetition was an enounced. The two solo parts were taken by members of the Club in a manner which fell but little short of the highest excellence, and the orchestral accompaniments were very delicately played. Barnby's Rebekah formed the first part of the programme, and between the works, Mendelssohn's Overture, "Heimkehr aus der Fremde" was well played by the band.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. R. Felix Blackbee, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of St. James, Knatchbull Road, Cambersell.—Mr. F. Elfrington Thomson, to Dulwich Grove Church, East Dulwich, S.E.—Mr. F. J. Dugard, Organist and Director of the Choir to Holy Trinity Church, Folkestone—Mr. W. A. Griesbach, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity Church, Houselow.—Mr. Samuel Moore, to St. Thomas's Church, Stamford Hill, N.

A HARVEST PASTORAL

BY ALFRED R. GAUL

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy respers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved family tiro of women on whom the calamity of perry and family tiro of women on whom the calamity of perry and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal sorrow into joy, are all introduced and apply take eitr allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Clitisen.

EIGHT HARVEST HYMNS. Words by Mr. Langran, and the Editor, Mr. A. H. Brown. Price 2d.; Words only, 2s. per 100.

"The hymns, which include a fine processional, are excellently written, and as suitably set; and if music is ever to win its way, will assuredly become great favourites at harvest festivals. They vary considerably in metre; but gladness and thanksgiving are the twin keynotes of all."—Western Morning News.
"A very excellent set of hymns, and most suitable for country parishes."—Church Times. only, 2s. per 100. "The hymns, parishes."—Church Times.

"The tunes are much in the current vein of thought, pleasant, tune-ful, and having a part-song flavour. Nos. r and 3, by the editor, are fresh and effective, and No. 5, by the same composer, is elegant in its melody and smooth in its harmony. No. 6, by that man of many accomplishments, Dean Alford, has a not unpleasant flavour of mixed antique and modern thought. Mr. Langran's (No. 4), a plain note against note tune, will be found to sing well. Dr. Dykes' (No. 2) is elegant and melodious, and set in the quasi-ecclesiastical measure six-four, a time borrowed by the Church from an early period of modern dramatic music. The tunes will not fail to please modern toloris."—Maxical Standard.

"We would specially draw attention to the unusually good common metre tune '5t. Angelus', No. 5, which might well pass for a composition of two hundred and fifty years ago."—Church Herald.

NEW HARVEST ANTHEM.

FEAR NOT, O LAND. Composed by S. C. Cooke.

"A good anthem."—Christian World.

"Is a well-arranged setting, and will certainly meet with success."—

NEW WORK

A RRANGEMENTS for the ORGAN. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect. Nos. 1 to 12 now ready.

SHORT SETTINGS OF THE

(INCLUDING BENEDICTUS AND AGNUS DEI) FOR PAROCHIAL AND GENERAL USE

> EDITED BY GEORGE C. MARTIN. Price One Shilling each.

Church-music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir, and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral societies are almost universal. This want is specially felt with regard to music for the Office of Holy Communion, and it is hoped that these services will be found well within the capabilities of an ordinary choir, yet not wanting in an effort to give due expression to the solemnity of the words.

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The planoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS FROM ANCIENT TYPES, BY

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc. "The very excellent illustrations scattered throughout the book materially increase its value; and we sincerely hope that Dr. Stainer's labours may be rewarded as they deserve, for not only has be accumulated a large mass of reliable information upon a subject of the deepest interest, but he has thrown additional light upon much of this evidence by giving us the result of his own practical experience."—Musical Times.

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

EMIL BEHNKE

CHARLES W. PEARCE.

In Cloth Boards, Three Shillings. Price Eighteenpence.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS, &c.

Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . doubtless will prove of great utility.

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"JOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."-Musical Standard.

"The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubt- Gazette. less be extensive in accordance with its merits."-Academic Gazette.

principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."-Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

on the principles advocated in 'The Mechanism of combine science with simplicity and system with the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more charm."-Oldham Evening Chronicle.

"I am much obliged to you for sending me your | elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emi The exercises are published for each of the severa ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheap ness they deserve to find a very large sale."-Illus trated London News.

> "These exercises are the best of the kind we hav seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. W wish the authors every success in their endeavour to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."-Publi Opinion.

> "A personal experience in my own family enable me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke' method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasin the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be abl to recommend the exercises as being thoroughl practical and most useful."-C. D., Household Words

> "The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written wi' commend them to the notice of professors an students alike."-Sunday Times.

> "That the work is based upon sound philosophica principles is certain, and it may be said with con fidence that no better exercises for the purposes of voice cultivation are to be met with."-Birminghar

"The exercises are emphatically practical; bu they are enhanced in value by pretty and attractive "They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal melody, occasionally rising far above the characte of mere training compositions."-Salisbury Times.

"The authors have conferred a great boon on th musical world and on the public generally by th "This is a valuable series of vocal studies, based publication of these exercises, which so happil

BOWMANVILLE, ONTARIO, CANADA.

ACTION-

Inventors of the Double Valve Action, both valves opening with only one pitman; originators of the manner of opening Back Valve by means of Lever. By this invention our larger Organs have the advantage over any other makers, using Exhaust Bellows, as by the free and proper distribution of the Vibrators we are enabled to produce quick speech from the largest to the smallest reed, with either light or strong blowing of Bellows. Our Mr. G. Piggott originated this action in the year 1873, and the same has been perfected and used by us for the last ten years.

CRIBNER TUBES-

Only by the above system of action can the Scribner Tubes be used with full effect, as the register in connection with the Tubes opens into the back valve, thereby adding greatly to the power and brilliancy of the Tube Register or set of Reeds. The invention known as Scribner Tubes we have used for the last ten years, neither time nor expense having been spared in improving and perfecting the same, and only in our various Combination Styles can the best effect of this invention be found.

WO-MANUAL ORGANS-

Our various styles of Two Manual and Pedal Organs are simple in construction, and the coupler movements are not liable to get out of order. We particularly call attention to the arrangement of the Vibrators or Reeds, also to the Pedal and Manual Coupler arrangements, of which we are the original inventors.

Style 93.

Our system of Bellows will withstand all climatic changes, as by our method of construction all risks of cracking and splitting are avoided, all the wooden parts being pinned and pannelled, leaving an opening of about one-eighth of an inch between panel and frame work, which is covered with strong rubber drill.

AND ONLY RELIABLE

Organ Pedals Actions &

PIANOFORTES

CAUTION .- Ainsworth's Patent Organ Pedal Attachments are the only ones which should be used, as they are positively the only ones which do not in the least deteriorate the Tone or Action of Pianoforte.

Ainsworth's Organ Pedals and Patent Actions are used by Organists and Organ Students in almost every town and village in England, and are much used in Scotland. They are moderately used in Ireland and Wales, and are being exported continually to every part of the globe. The Organ Pedals and Patent Actions are made by the most improved steam machinery and specially made tools, which guarantee great accuracy in working without having recourse to complicated fittings. A careful examination of Ainsworth's Lists (with reference numbers and explanation) will, we doubt not, clearly prove to any one the true "Perfection" of his inventions.

HUNDREDS OF TESTIMONIALS RECEIVED.

"Mr. Ainsworth (Fellow of the Society of Science) has most ingeniously arranged his Organ Pedal Attachments for Pianofortes, so as to allow their being locked (when not in use) by simply drawing out a stop. The Organ Pedals can also be removed and replaced at will. The most valuable arrangement, however, is that of perfect freedom, there not being even a possible chance of sticking or getting out of order."

A. HUNTER & SON

Have just made some very important Improvements in the construction of Organs, and have patented a TUBULAR PNEUMATIC CHAMBER FOR COUPLING—an Organ having been built to show these improvements, and to illustrate the special advantages of the Tubular Coupling Chamber. Some of the special advantages in Organs built on this principle are:—

1st.—That as the Couplers do not affect the Keys, a uniform touch is obtained.

2nd.—That they act more promptly than any ordinary arrangement can; and 3rd.—That they require no extra pressure of wind, and, consequently, there is no extra cost to maintain them.

The Clergy, Protession, and Organ Builders are respectfully invited to inspect the Organ at the Factory, 65A, High Street, Clapham, S.W.

The following is a description of the Organ built on the Tubular Principle by Messrs, A. Hunter and Son:—

SEPTEMBER I, 1885.

NETHERLANDISH MUSICIANS

By W. A. BARRETT.

THE idea generally entertained concerning the music of the "Low Countries" in England, by the educated as well as by the ignorant, is not in any way complimentary to the people among whom it is practised and with whom it originated. A Dutch Concert, for example, is understood to be a quaint sort of musical diversion, in which every man sings a verse of the song he likes best simultaneously with his neighbour, who is exercising the like independence of thought and action. It is therefore assumed that the people from whom the custom has been derived must be as indifferent to the charms of the vocal and harmonic art as those whom Shakespeare has certified as only "fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils." It is never once doubted that the term can have no real foundation in fact. Other things that are Dutch unquestionably owe their origin to the people after whom they are named: why not the Dutch Concert? There may possibly be a confusion of ideas in the application, rendered permanent by the progress of time and undisturbed employment. It may not be out of place to remind the reader that at one time all the people who spoke the Teutonic dialects were classified in England as Dutch; the only difference between Germans and Flemings being expressed in the adjectives "high or low," as the case required. The German tongue was called "High" and the language of the Netherlands "Low Dutch." It is therefore possible that the cacophonous independence of vocal exertion, distinguished by the name of a "Dutch Concert," may have been derived from some cherished practice among the folk called "High." That there is evidence in the present day of a "sneaking kindness" towards the custom still existing in certain orchestral combinations in which the Teutonic mind delights, may be accepted as confirmation of the possibility of the origin elsewhere than among the folk now known as Dutch. It is, perhaps, a curious fact, relative to the subject, that in many parts of America all German-speaking people are still called Dutch. Gloves and toys made in the "father-land" are also known as Dutch. The want of accuracy in description often leads many worthy people to accept a familiar phrase as a typical epitome of the character of everything otherwise belonging to the matter so distinguished. The examination and refutation of such ideas would involve an extensive attack on popular errors, more ponderous, if less learned, than the famous book of Sir Thomas Browne printed in 1646. Have there been no "vulgar errors" since that day that no one has cared to explode? Perhaps the literary bomb-shell that is to cause their destruction is "yet a preparing." Meantime, it may be said that the present paper may be modestly offered as a humble contribution to so great an end on the part of the knowledge concerning Netherlandish music.

In treating of this subject it may be as well to remind the reader that the area comprised in the term "Netherlandish" extends to the boundaries anciently understood, and includes what is now known as Belgium as well as Holland; northward from Groningen to the southernmost point, where the river Meuse forms the barrier between France and the country of the Belgæ. The historical associations of this vast tract of country are very great, trained singers from Amsterdam. It is true that from the time of Cæsar onward, and the important events which have taken place on its soil have influenced not only the country immediately con-cerned, but the whole civilised world. It is impossible not to admire the people who, in spite of internal struggles and contentions, have never lost sight of the value of independence and freedom. In the midst of all distractions, their contests for liberty of political and religious thought, they have never neglected the cultivation of the domestic virtues, and the encouragement of the arts which glorify them. The Dutch and Flemish painters have, from time immemorial, held supremacy in the artistic world, and their claims to distinction are duly recognised. It is only necessary to show that the like power in music was once possessed by them, and that from the earliest times they had musicians who have exercised greater sway over the progress of musical discoveries than is either claimed for or admitted beyond the circle of those who have given attention to the subject.

The fact that music has become universal has, in some degree, tended to obscure to many the narrow paths by which the present broad expanse has been reached.

The details of the history of the rise of musical art are, in many cases, so unsatisfactory and detached that the task of weaving a consecutive narrative of the early steps has been abandoned over and over again by those who have attempted to trace them.

How much, in England, has been lost by the senseless destruction of the ancient monuments preserved in the monasteries, at the time of the so-called Reformation, can only be guessed at. Unfortunately, these political and religious disturbances have taken place in other countries also, where records might have been looked for. As these disturbances assume, more or less, the same form in their career-namely, the wanton annihilation of the treasures of antiquity -it is only by comparing those that have escaped the general wreck that an approximate notion of successive approaches towards perfection can be guessed at. So disappointing, however, is the information which can be gathered from these fragments that many historians, whose well regulated minds are impatient at the gaps and breaches which cannot be joined sufficiently strong to serve their purposes, abandon the whole business in despair, and begin their narratives and references at a period where all things are tolerably clear and consecutive.

There are, for example, scarcely two historians who agree as to the meaning and power of the scanty monuments of Greek music, and musical terms, which have descended to the present age. The difficulty of consent being interfered with by the fact that one prefers to call that the top which the other calls the bottom.

A certain amount of comfort arises out of the assurance that the whole subject is a curiosity which has little bearing upon modern art.

The history of the labours and discoveries of the old Netherlandish musicians is of far greater value, and it may yet be hoped that the subject will receive the attention it deserves from those who possess the opportunity and means for prosecuting further researches.

Meantime, a short sketch of the work done by these "old fathers of harmony" may serve as a stopgap until more exhaustive accounts can be supplied.

At the outset, it must be stated, that a special incentive has been given to the enquiry by the perrecently, by Mr. Daniel de Lange and a choir of well- Jerome of Moravia, Philippe de Vitry, John of even in Holland, where there exists a high reverence for the deeds of the forefathers, it is only of late years that the examination has been set on foot-first, by the admirable "Collectio Operum Musicorum Batavorum Sæculi XVI., Edidit Francisus Commer," published by Trautwein, of Berlin; and further, by the formation of a body called "De Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst en de vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlands Muziek-Geschiedenis," a Society for the encouragement of music and the study and collection of Netherlandish musical history. Several works have been published at Amsterdam by the Society, and include collections of pieces by various composers—Obrecht, Jan Pieters Sweelinck, Cornelius Schuijt, and some old Dutch songs out of the "Nederlandtshen Gedenck Clanck," of Adrianus Valerius (1626), and one or two other works which represent scarcely a tithe of what remains to be done. It is but just to say that the research exhibited in the editing is most commendable and valuable, more especially when the subject has been so neglected. The names of some of the most important musicians, whose works are here republished, are either mentioned with brief comment in the accepted dictionaries of musical biography or not mentioned at all. For example, the student will look in vain in the "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," of Fétis, for any account of Cornelius Schuijt, one of the most notable of sixteenth century Netherlandish musicians. The fact of the omission of his name is the more remarkable as Fétis himself was a Netherlander, and the care with which his researches were made was often influenced by the highest love for his art, and reverence for its ancient professors and teachers.

He tells elsewhere of the great influence exercised upon the study of the art in early days by the inhabitants of the Flemish continent. The reputed inventor of counterpoint, Hucbald, was a Fleming, who died about the year 930. He is also named by some writers as the first who employed lines for music, which afterwards were formed into the stave. Whether his claims to these inventions will ever be definitely established it matters little now, either to him or to posterity. All that is known of his works prove him to be a man of clearness of intellect, and perspicuous in his mode of expression. There are several manuscripts of treatises assigned to him, but that called "Musica Enchiriadis" is considered by Fétis to be the only one really from his hand. This work, preserved in a beautiful MS. of the twelfth century in the National Library at Paris, is in nineteen chapters, and forms a complete treatise on elementary music, and includes a system of notation, of which Hucbald was probably the inventor, though he does not state the fact. He gives a table of eight sounds in the old Saxon notation and in his own, which furnishes a certain means for deciphering other notations of the period. Further particulars concerning this interesting Fleming may be read in the monograph, under the title: "Mémoire sur in the monograph, under the title: Hucbald et sur ses traités de musique, suivi de recherches sur la notation et sur les instruments de musique." Paris, 1841, written by M. Ed. de Coussemaker, also a Netherlander by descent.

The life and works of Hucbald do not, however, represent the whole of the musical labours of the past, nor would it be just to say that no other countries produced men of genius, of light and leading, in the so-called dark ages. There were Regnion of Odo, Abbot of Cluni, Adelbold, Guido d'Arezzo (one of the most brilliant of the lamps of the past), John Cotton, John of Dunstable (Englishmen both), formances of Netherlandish music at the Albert Hall the three Francos (of Cologne, of Paris, and of Liege), Chartreux, Tinctoris, Anselm of Parma, Hothbi, Robert de Handlo, Walter Odington (more Englishmen), and many others, whose treatises are triumphs of wonder and astonishment to posterity, if not of instruction. Apart from the well known discoveries and statements of Guido d'Arezzo, perhaps the greatest of all in the above list was Hucbald the Fleming.

Hucbald gives examples of the "harmony" of his period, which was a sweet succession of fourths and fifths, scarcely tolerable to modern ears; whereby it has been assumed that, in his desire to accommodate his harmonies to his Pythagorean theories, he did violence not only to his own sense, but to his knowledge. It is hard to believe that the power of musical appreciation was less discriminate in the far-away days in which Hucbald lived than now. It is true that men suffered much for religion's sake, and for this reason, it may be, that they tolerated the barbarous organum of fourths and fifths as representing harmony in the Church service, while they were allowed to use a secular organum of thirds and sixths in everyday life. However, posterity has just cause to be grateful to the old Netherlander for one if not for two things—namely, the introduction of freer principles of harmony, and the use of a stave for exhibiting the relative positions of sounds to be produced.

The secular organum gradually found its way into the Church service, notwithstanding the belief that all sensuous delights were due to the promptings of the devil. The introduction of descant suggested the necessity of regulating the length of the notes over which the descant was to be sang. So the time-

Once more, the most prominent and skilful of the descanters were the dwellers in the north-east of France and in the Netherlands. From the provinces between the rivers Seine and Scheldt, the practice assumed the form of a mania, like the tulipomania and the Polkamania of far-removed years. Out of this descanting certain fixed and recognised laws were formed, and as the use of the hitherto almost avoided thirds and sixths became more general, the precepts of harmony arising out of their employment resolved themselves into tangible shapes which could be brought to the aid of original composition.

That there were many composers in the early centuries after Hucbald there is no reason to doubt. The treatises by the authors already named may possibly have been by men who were also composers. For reasons, however, which have been referred to, the chain of perfect information is broken, and all that can be assumed tends to encourage the belief that the steady pursuit of scientific knowledge in music was never abandoned, otherwise it would be impossible to account for the appearance on the scene of so great a genius as Willem Dufay, born at Chimay, in Hainault, near the borders of France, in the year 1350. He shares with Giles Binchois and John of Dunstable the honour of having brought the exercise of descant within the boundaries of purer and more tractable harmony. There are pieces by Willem Dufay still extant. His masses are based upon common tunes, well known in his time. One called "L'omme armé" has been taken as a theme for counterpoint by other writers, so that in its use Dufay is not singular; others have the tunes "Se la face si pale" and "Tant me deduis." Each one is a valuable link in the chain of composition, as showing the efforts made to get away from the old restrictive practice and rules of descant to the greater liberty allowed in polyphonic treatment. The distribution of the parts above the plain song of the selected theme indicates no mean skill, and audiences of the turies ago, with pleasure. Willem Dufay, who has been claimed, without reason, by certain French writers as belonging to their own nation, died in 1432. He was one of the earliest of the Netherlandish musicians who understood and practised the device of "imitation," as may be seen in his Chanson for three voices, called "Cent milles escus quant je voeldroie," a song further remarkable for the purity of the harmony it contains. Dufay was a singer in the Pontifical Chapel at Rome, and the vocal character of his works was evidently influenced by experience of the requirements and capabilities of singers. Hence his music has a humanity in it which is not always to be found in contemporary or previous productions. If Dufay was not actually the pupil, it is assumed that he was influenced by the music of Zeelandia (d. 1370), the first composer who disused the continuous succession of fourths and fifths in harmony. How far Dufay influenced his contemporaries Busnois, Caron, Faugues, Gezeghem, and others, may be gathered from the fact that the works of Ockeghem, their successor, show a distinct advance in thought, which could only have been brought about by the exercise of personal genius carefully prepared by the study of existing works.

Ockeghem, also called Okeghem and Okenheim, was born about the year 1415, at the Walloon town of Bavay, now belonging to Northern France, but which at the time of his birth formed part of the Netherlands. Fétis assumes the date of his birth to have been in the year 1430, in which case the time of his entry into the world is coincident with that of Jacques Obrecht, another great Netherlandish musician, whose labours demand special mention. The probability is that the date given by the "Maatschappij," whose terrible title need not be quoted again-namely, 1420is correct. The skill of Ockeghem was great enough to induce his admirers in after times to declare that he had written a piece for thirty-six voices. In the Dodecachordon of Glareanus, 1547, the statement "Okenheim qui ingenio omneis excelluisse dicitur, quippe quem constat triginta sex vocibus garritum quemdam (missam) instituisse," is more remarkable for its canine felicity of expression than for its accuracy of statement. The condition of musical knowledge of the period did not admit of so complicated a piece of construction; and, moreover, none of those who, following Glareanus, or who were followed by him, confess to having seen the work they profess to admire. There can be no doubt that art had made considerable advances in the days of Ockeghem, but not sufficient to justify the statement made concerning his particular exercise of it.

There are sacred compositions by him, which are remarkable as showing the dawning desire of musicians to convey expression into their writings, a desire carried to greater fruition by Jacques Obrecht, who was partly contemporary with Ockeghem, but who exceeded him in all but the number of his years. Ockeghem died in 1512 at a patriarchal age, and saw not only the dawning of the genius of the great musicians, some of whom, like Louis Compere and Antonius Brumel, were his pupils, who were destined to extend the study and the resources of the art, but also the means by which its discoveries and productions might be made permanent and universal. The art of printing had been invented, and the value of the press had been eagerly welcomed on all sides. One of the very first works printed by Ottavio Petrucci Fossembrome, at Venice, were the "Misse obreht" (sic) in separate parts; at the end of the bass part may be read :- " Impssm Venetiis per Octivianum

of Obrecht's masses may be considered as among the earliest examples of music printed from types. There are five masses in the collection, all based upon secular tunes—namely, Je ne demande, Grecorum, Fortuna desperata, Malheur me bact (which, by the way, may be compared with his pupil Josquin des Prés's melody "Douleur me bat") and Salva diva parens. This information is given only on the "Superius" part, and the colophon on the "Bassus" is as already indicated. There is some very fine music in these masses, especially in that called "Fortuna desperata," which is set for three and four voices; but Obrecht's name is remembered less by the knowledge of his compositions than for the fact that he was the music-master of Erasmus when he was a chorister at Utrecht, and still more does he deserve the consideration of posterity from the circumstance of his having been the instructor of Josquin des Prés and of Pierre de la Rue, and through them, of inaugurating the advance of musical art in the direction which has continued without interruption to the present day.

Josquin des Prés, horn in 1450, was one of the greatest musical geniuses of his own or of any age, as his works bear testimony. He was as industrious as he was clever. He wrote a number of masses, nineteen of which have been printed. The press has also preserved about 150 of his motetts, more than sixty of his secular compositions, including the beautiful dirge "Nymphes des bois, deésses des fontaines," which he wrote on the death of his master, Ockeghem, in 1507, besides other pieces. The quaint humour which was prevalent at the period, and which is so often referred to by the biographers of Erasmus, was also possessed by Josquin. It forms the salt of many anecdotes told concerning him, and is reflected in certain of his secular compositions, such as "Petite Camusette"; and the depth of his musical feeling is forcibly shown in his hymn in the dirge alluded to above, as well as in such pieces as "Douleur me hat."

"Douleur me bat."

The wit he displayed in writing a part in a trio for the king, Louis XII., whose feeble voice was only capable of sustaining a single note, has been alluded to over and over again. His tact in reminding the king of broken promises, by writing a motett to the words from the 119th Psalm, "Memor esto verbi tui," ought to have been rewarded by the fulfilment of the promise. But it was not to be. It was left for his successor to redeem the kingly word, which was accomplished when Josquin was made Canon of St. Quentin. In gratitude, the musician made another motett from the same Psalm, beginning "Bonitatem fecisti."

The fertility of his invention, and the romantic expression, which was the characteristic of religious worship of the middle ages, breathes in every page of Josquin's music. Martin Luther worshipped his works, and it is not difficult to realise that the study of them justifies Baini, in his life of Palestrina, when he speaks of him as "the idol of Europe." His influence on his contemporaries was enormous. Even in the works of those who, like Jacques Arcadelt, are denied as having been his pupils, may be traced a loving following of his ideas. He may not have been so fortunate as his master, Ockeghem, in the intellectual excellence of those he was called upon to teach; but it is certain that what was lacking in mental capacity was made up by the affection he inspired.

Whether it was for the love he awakened all around that posterity owes the preservation of his works, or for their own inherent merit, it matters not now to inquire. Certain it is, that his fellow pupil, Pierre de la Rue (born 1450), was less fortunate, either in imade their chiefest offerings at the feet of the Virgin the number of his pupils or in the enthusiasm he inspired. It is known that he was an indefatigable worker, but there are very few of the results of his labours known. Only a scanty number compared with what he is asserted to have produced have descended to the present generation. There are, fortunately, sufficient to prove the value and power of his musical thoughts, and to show him as a worthy pupil of a worthy master.

He also has been claimed as French, as he was born in Picardie. This province was one of the possessions of the Duke of Burgundy, and was anciently comprised within the territory known as the Low Countries, or the Netherlands; therefore he is entitled to mention in the present list, alike from the place of his birth as from the locality of his education. One of his Masses upon "L'omme armé" was printed by Petrucci in 1501, and several of his Madrigals have been preserved in various libraries.

There is no question but that from these two musicians the extension of the study of the art emanated, and the foundation of the modern style of writing took its rise.

Henry Isaac (1460-1518) is asserted to be the father of German musical art, and he was a pupil of Josquin des Prés.

Clement Jannequin (1480-1559) also a scholar of the same master, and who caught some of the humour which distinguishes certain of his works, as is exemplified in his "Chant des Oyseaux," "La Chasse de lièvre," and his musical combination of the street cries of Paris "Voulez ouyr les cris de Paris," for four voices, helped to give an impetus to the serious study of music in France. Some of his vocal music aims at dramatic expression. There is a piece by him for five voices, "Escoutez tous gentilz galloys," which professes to describe a battle, and is therefore designated "La Bataille." He was the first who attempted to write "picturesque music" by introducing imitations of the songs of birds and the chatter of women, as in his "Chant du Rossignol" and "Le Caquet des Femmes." These choruses, or Chansons as they were called, gave rise to a number of imitations, especially in Italy.

The famous Giovanni Croce followed his illustrious predecessor in his imitations of the nightingale and the cuckoo, and English Madrigal students need scarcely be reminded of the "Nightingale" of Thomas Weelkes to support the assertion that other musicians besides Italians imitated the eccentric practices of Clement Jannequin in his clever "Inventions musicales."

Jacques Arcadelt (1490-1575) is said to have been another pupil of Josquin's. If so, the music of Italy dates from his sojourn in that country. The famous Loyset Compére (1460-1518), together with Thomas Crequillon (born 1515); Josquin Baston (1510-1570); Jean le Cocq, famed for his canons; Nicolas Goubert; Jean Lupi; Jean Guyot, alias Castileti; Antony Barbi; Pierre Manchecourt, who carried Flemish music into Spain; Noë Faigneant; Cipriano di Rore; the voluminous Filippo di Monte (1521-1603), who published thirty-one books of madrigals, six of motetts, and two of masses; Adrian Willaert, the pupil of Jean Mouton, a Frenchman, who is, however, claimed as a Fleming; Jacques de Wert, or Vert; Cornelius Verdonck; Jean Richafort, and Huberto Waelrent, were the minor priests in the temple of music in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century, who helped to spread the doctrines of their harmonious faith through all lands. Many of their works were known and studied equally with those of the Italian and French composers in England, and gave rise to that glorious band of composers who Queen, whom they poetically designated the "Fair the service of the Church. The mighty genius of

The position of leader of musical art in the Netherlands, after the death of Josquin des Prés in 1521, seems to have been shared by Thomas Crequillon (c. 1515-1560); Jacob Clement, or Clemens non Papa (1500-1556), as he was fantastically called by his contemporaries, humorously to distinguish him from the Pope Clement VII. (Guilio de Medici), who reigned between the years 1523 and 1534; and Nicholas Goubert (1495-1570). But a greater genius than any of these three appeared in the person of Orlandus Lassus, whose name, de-Latinised, was Roland de Lattre.

He was born in 1520, at Mons, in Hennegau; and it is stated that as a boy he was witness of the degradation of his father, who was convicted of coining, and condemned to walk three times round the public scaffold wearing a collar of the spurious coins round his neck. The boy changed his name from De Lattre to Lassus and left for Italy. He returned to be present at the death-bed of his parents, and settled for a while in Antwerp.

The wealth of the Netherlanders helped to give encouragement to art, science, and learning in all its branches. Thus it is that the history of the early part of the sixteenth century shows a list of distinguished names in every degree of learning and attainments.

The time would fail to tell of the work of all the illustrious masters of the musical art of the period. They not only loved their art but they sought by all possible means to spread that love among others. One section of this musical missionary band entered upon their labours in Venice and Upper Italy, among whom were Adrian Willaert, Cyprian di Rore, or Van Roor, Van Boes, Berchem, and others. Another, headed by Arcadelt, Verdelot, and Goudimel, found their sphere of action in Rome and Central Italy; a third party, united to this latter body, consisting of Jacob Vaet, Phillip di Monte, Christian Hollaander, and Orlandus Lassus, influenced the German people on the East of their own country, and even extended their mission as far as Bohemia. The spirit with which they all approached their work may be gathered from the saying of the greatest of the group, Orlandus Lassus. His industry was enormous, yet it is scarcely possible to believe that he left more than 2,400 works, in addition to his other labours. until his motto, "As long as the Almighty keeps me in health I do not dare to be idle," is known and understood. He was organist at Munich at the time of his death, in 1594, and a statue to his memory has been erected in that city, where the last of his descendants, an old man of eighty-two, bearing his own honoured name, died so recently as 1864.

The last of the great Netherlandish musicians were Jan Pieters Sweelinck, and Cornelius Schuijt. The first named, born in Amsterdam, or as some say in Deventer in the year 1564, was regarded with the greatest affection by all his pupils, and he had many as well in Holland as in North Germany. Sweelinck's fame as an organist is greater than his reputation as a composer. Until quite recently his works have been Thanks to the "Maatschappij, almost unknown. &c., aforesaid, his music has been brought from the undeserved obscurity into which it had fallen. Contemporary with him were many Netherlandish musicians, the chief of whom, Cornelius Schuijt, born in 1557, seems to have inherited with Sweelinck a double portion of the genius of the old masters. One cause for the neglect of the music of the majority of the great men whose names have been given may be found in the observance of the decree of the Papal Council, which forbade the use of figurate music in intending visitors some indication of the scope and Palestrina, who produced the Missa Papæ Marcelli, has obscured, if it has not absorbed, most of all that had been done in the same direction by his predecessors and contemporaries. If there was any injustice done to art by the preference of one musician, it is not too late to remedy it. Palestrina adhered with reverent scrupulousness to the pattern accepted by the Sacred College without in any way sacrificing his own individuality. On the contrary, his individuality gave a stamp of worth to labours which might have degenerated into a mere perfunctory observance of a prescribed form. Had it been otherwise the influence of his productions would not have been lasting, and art might have suffered.

The life of art may be hampered, but its spirit cannot be restrained for long. Hence, the human expression which exists in the music of most of the early writers, though long suppressed, could not be deprived of its vitality. It gradually asserted itself, and became a recognised power in the development of the art.

An acquaintance with the works of the old Netherlandish musicians proves that there was a steady advance in the attempt to express spiritual, as well as sentimental, life. The decree which elevated Palestrina at the expense of all other musicians may have been a gain on one side, but it was a distinct loss on the other.

Those who believe that musical art did not find proper expression until the Papal Church sanctioned the form in which it should take, may change their opinions when they become acquainted with the achievements of the old Netherlandish musicians.

In our last month's article on this Exhibition we stated positively that the decision of the authorities not to issue a catalogue had been reconsidered, and that the work was then in hand. Those who read the angry letters which shortly afterwards appeared in some of the daily papers on this subject may have been led to suppose that our assertion was incorrect, but the question has now been set at rest by the actual appearance of the catalogue. This is so far satisfactory, but the book bears traces of being got up in a prodigious hurry, and it is nothing more than a reproduction of the labels on the various objects, a large proportion of which are still "temporary," and without any descriptive details. Indeed, its incompleteness is acknowledged, and a second edition is promised, the issue of the first being necessary "owing to the pressing demand." In other words, the Council having sinned at leisure have had to repent in haste in consequence of the severe moral castigation they were receiving in all quarters for their neglect of an obvious duty. The whole business affords an instance of the power for good the musical and general press can wield in art matters when plain speaking is absolutely necessary. We are happy to learn that a permanent, and far more valuable, record of the collection than the present meagre pamphlet is in preparation, in the form of a catalogue raisonné, under the editorship of Mr. A. J. Hipkins. His task will be an arduous one, but it could not be in more capable hands, and he will have the satisfaction of knowing that he is rendering a notable service to all who are interested in the history and development of musical art. It only remains for us to complete the rapid survey of the Exhibition which we commenced in our August number, so as to afford comprehensiveness of a display "by far the most complete ever brought together in any country," to quote Mr. Hipkins's words in his preface to the

We have already dealt with the claviers and stringed instruments, but before passing to the other divisions it may be as well to call attention to a few of the items which may best be described as curiosities. Perhaps the most noteworthy of these, in more senses than one, is the so-called "Queen Elizabeth's Lute," which is honoured with a case to itself. cording to the description given, this instrument was "left by Queen Elizabeth in 1584, at Helmingham Hall, Suffolk, as an heirloom to commemorate her Majesty having stood sponsor to an infant, who was after Sir Lyonel Tollemache. The lute has never left Helmingham until it was lent for exhibition here." A very pretty story, but, unfortunately, unsupported by evidence. However, the matter is not of the slightest musical importance, and the lute (or rather orpheoron) is interesting in itself as being, undoubtedly, the work of John Rose, the inventor of the instrument, according to the "Syntagma Musicum," of Prætorius. The label within reads "Johannes Rosa, Londini, fecit. In Bridewell, the 27th of July, 158o." In another case are two very ancient harps, one known as the Lamont harp, dating from the early part of the 15th century, and the other called Queen Mary's harp, because it was given by that Queen to Beatrix Gardyne, of Banchory. In the collection of the Brussels Conservatoire is a complete set of Cromornes or Krumhorns, believed to be unique. This obsolete crooked horn of wood has left a trace of its existence in the organ stop, for a long period barbarously termed a cremona in England, though now, we believe, generally called by a more suitable appellation. Other curiosities are four pastoral horns in wood, of a remote date; a Dresden china clock of the time of Louis XVI., with a number of figures representing a monkey band, about as hideously inartistic a production as a lover of the grotesque could wish for; Charles Edward Stuart's bagpipe, and other family and historical relics not necessary to mention in this place.

The collection of early manuscripts is not particularly rich or numerous, but there are some very interesting examples. The celebrated Monastery of St. Gall has lent some of its treasures, the most remarkable of which is an "Antiphoner and Gradual," asserted to be of the 9th century, with two ivory plaques of the 4th century on one of the covers. This manuscript is traditionally said to have been copied by Romanus from St. Gregory the Great, between 772 and 795, and to have been brought by him to St. Gall. Other contributors to this part of the Exhibition are the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, several of the Cathedral chapters, and the Bodleian library. chronological order we next come to the early printed books. These include one of the greatest treasures in the world, the famous "Mentz" or "Mainz Psalter," belonging to Earl Spencer. It was printed in 1457, by John Fust and Peter Schöffer, and is the first book with a date and printer's name. We might fill much space by enumerating the many beautiful examples of the printer's art in the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries, but must be content with naming one other volume, which contains what is believed to be the first example of printed musical notation. The feelings of joy, hope, pity, fear, and grief are represented by a descending scale of notes, probably intended to be connected by a stave of five lines "Collectorium super Magnificat. Strasburg, 1473."

well-known composer may be studied by means of letters and musical scores. Among the most noteworthy items may be named Beethoven's so-called will, and his letter of March 18, 1827 (only eight days before his death), thanking the Philharmonic Society for their gift of £100; and several of the autograph scores of Handel's Oratorios from Buckingham Palace. Among the relics are a lace ruffle worn by Handel, a mask of Beethoven taken four years before his death, his silver watch, and a lock of his

It cannot be said that the pictures and prints relating to music are imposing in point of numbers, and of those which hang on the walls the vast majority come from two or three sources. Taking Great Britain alone, there must be an enormous quantity of paintings in the hands of private owners, which may be said in one way or another to come within the scope of the present Exhibition. But it is likely that the invitations to send works of art to the Albert Hall were limited, for if they had been issued broadcast the result would probably have been an embarrassingly large collection. Whether imaginative subjects can be said to be in place in a display intended to illustrate the history of music is doubtful; but they have not been altogether excluded, though they are not present in sufficient numbers to leaven the collection as a whole. The most remarkable example is Salvator Rosa's "Singing Skull," the masterly treatment in which compensates for the repulsiveness of the subject. In the same category may be placed Mulready's familiar "Tired out," a pair of juvenile Mulready's familiar "Tired out," a pair of juvenile itinerant musicians lying on the steps of a theatre; also Sir Peter Lely's beautifully drawn "Head of a harper," Velasquez's "Bagpiper," and Code's clever "Masked Ball." These last three are lent by Lord Spencer, who is one of the most liberal contributors to the Exhibition. The antiquarian musician, who is naturally interested in pictures illustrating ancient instruments, will not find much here to satisfy him. A "Portrait of an artist playing upon a harpsichord," by Sofanisba Anguisciola, is noteworthy for its abstract merits as a painting, as is strictly musical sense, the interest of the show centres in the portraits, which are numerous, a large proportion of them being the property of the Royal Society of Musicians and the University of Oxford. The former have sent fine pictures of Haydn and Purcell and two of Handel. From the latter come a striking head of Orlando di Lasso, and others of Gibbons and Corelli, besides several which, however true to their originals, have no particular art merit. This last remark, however, does not apply to Sir Peter Lely's "Blow," shown by Sir F. G. Ouseley; Rom-ney's "Crotch as a Boy," lent by Mr. John Gill; or Millais's "Sterndale Bennett," the property of Mr. T. Case. Here also may be seen the splendid statue of Handel by Roubilliac, formerly in the Vauxhall Gardens, and now belonging to Mr. Henry Littleton, who also sends Denner's portrait of the great master which was formerly in the collection of the old Sacred Harmonic Society. Sir James Thornhill's portrait of the composer, from the Fitzwilliam Museum; one of Weber, by John Cawse; and a picture representing George III. playing the flute, Giardini the violin, and Lord Aylesford the violoncello, deserve mention. If we mistake not, the last named has experienced the tender mercies of the restorer. But the gem of the collection is unquestionably a half-length portrait of Mozart, painted at Rome in 1770 by Pompeo ruled in red ink by hand. The title of the book is Battoni. Concerning this, Otto Jahn remarks, "The celebrated artist, Pompeo Battoni, of Rome, painted Autograph hunters will find very much here to a life-size head of Mozart, which came into the interest them. The handwriting of almost every possession of Mr. Haydon, of London; it is now the property of J. Ella, who has placed it in the South Kensington Museum, and rendered it familiar in an engraving by H. Adlard. The head is turned almost full face towards the spectator, the right hand holding a roll of music-paper. The animated countenance has an evident resemblance to the Verona portrait, but with more of a view to effect, being, in fact, what is called idealised." This is evidently the portrait, though the label states that it is now the property of

Mr. G. B. Davey. A glance at the old concert and opera programmes suggests two considerations-namely, that our fathers had no manner of respect for the intentions of composers, while their musical appetites must have been gigantic and omnivorous. Fancy such a performance as this, for example, at Her Majesty's Theatre: "The celebrated opera 'Marriage of Figaro' (the overture and music selected chiefly from Mozart's operas, the new music by Mr. Bishop); Susanna, by Madame Malibran Garcia, who will introduce 'The light guitar' and 'Should he upbraid.' In Act III., dances from 'Masaniello'; at the end of the opera, 'Bel Raggio,' from 'Semiramide.'" This occurred at the King's Theatre, on October 2, 1829. For incongruity and astounding length, an entertainment given on the occasion of Madame Schreeder Devrient's benefit, on July 3, 1833, may perhaps take the prize. It commenced with "Fidelio," in the course of which Madame Pasta sang an Italian air. Then came the third act of Rossini's "Otello," and, as a wind up, the grand ballet "La Sylphide." There was another on July 15, 1836, at Drury Lane, consisting of "Pidelio," a scene from "Il Barbiere," and the drama of "The Brigand." The oratorio performances were equally exhausting, for between the parts it was customary to introduce concertos. On April 13, 1791, we are told that there was an entertainment at Drury Lane, consisting of the overture to "Esther," the whole of Israel in Egypt," with no doubt the interpolated airs, and a miscellaneous selection including a dozen items. Among other interesting bills may be seen that of the entertainment given by Sir George Smart on the occasion of Weber's débût in London, that of the first performance of his "Oberon," and that of his Concert at the Argyll Rooms, the non-success of which depressed his spirits, and, perhaps, hastened his death.

To make our summary complete, it is necessary to note the curious collection of Oriental instruments on the left of the staircase from the conservatory, and the collection lent by the King of Siam in the court at the back of the music room. During the few weeks that yet remain, musicians and amateurs who have not yet visited this truly magnificent Exhibition will, doubtless, repair the omission. In too brief a space the various treasures will be once more scattered over the face of the earth.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS By JOSEPH BENNETT.

None of the circumstances amid which Bach found himself on taking up his Leipzig appointment can fail to be of interest, and we will deal with them here at some length.

The master was expected to live in the house set apart for the Cantor of the Thomas School, and he fulfilled this condition, with a brief interval, to the day of his death. Although forming part of the school buildings, the house in question was only two storeys high, and so small that, as time went on and Bach's family increased, additions were necessarily made to it. The work of enlargement was begun in house rented for him by the Council. Early in 1732, he returned to the official dwelling, which, we believe, still stands, though, on account of the removal of the school into the suburbs, no longer used for its ancient purpose. Bach lived rent-free, and enjoyed a fluctuating income, averaging 700 thalers per annum. This amount was made up in a variety of ways. From the Town Council the Cantor received 87 thalers, 12 groschen, with 13 thalers, 3 groschen for fuel and light; certain bequests and foundations brought in a number of small sums, and from the church revenues came sixteen bushels of corn, two cords of firewood, and two measures of wine three times a year. The balance was made up of fees, payable for work done in the school, and for services rendered at weddings, funerals, and so on. We need scarcely point out that Bach could not have existed in luxury on such a sum as 700 thalers, even with a house thrown in. But his income sufficed for modest wants, and the man whose income supplies his needs is rich. "The income of the Cantor," says Spitta, "allowed a man such as Bach, even with his numerous family, to live comfortably in the fashion of a simple artisan. We have evidence of this in his well-managed finances, and the well furnished and fitted house he left behind him at his death."

Let us now glance at the duties which our Cantor was required to discharge, and, first, as to the school. Bach gave seven music lessons each week—at nine and twelve on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Wednesdays, and at twelve on Fridays, his pupils in every case being the four upper classes. On Thursdays, at seven a.m., he took the boys to church, being free for the rest of the day; on Saturday, also at seven a.m., he taught the Latin catechism to the third and fourth classes, and on each day of the week he gave one Latin lesson to the third class. Besides this, Bach, as one of four superior masters, had charge of the foundation boys every fourth week, being expected during that time "to live entirely with them, and to comply with the regulations of the school-house, which required them to rise at five in the morning (at six in winter), to dine at ten, sup at five in the afternoon, and go to bed at eight." Such were Bach's duties in connection with the school; let us now see what the church demanded of him. understand this it is necessary to remember that the Thomas School was founded mainly as a nursery of church music. When Bach joined it the boys were divided into four choirs, which did duty at as many churches, including those of St. Thomas and St. Nicholas-the two most important in the town. The musical services in these places were directly under the Cantor, who took his first choir from one to the other; the second choir alternating, under the direction of its prefect. Rehearsals of the Sunday music took place regularly on Saturday afternoon, and lasted two hours. It was the business of the Cantor, moreover, to prepare and direct the music at weddings and funerals, and to choose and make ready that sung on the occasion of certain processions, or choir perambulations about the city. These took place four times a year. There remains only to state that the Cantor had the supreme oversight of the music in the other two churches served by his boys; though, actually, the duties he discharged in this connection were little more than nominal. It is natural to suppose that the responsibilities arising out of so many engagements proved onerous, but Bach soon found means to lighten the load. He got rid of the Latin lessons altogether; mostly left the second daily music lesson to a prefect, and took such full advantage of every opportunity for putting off his harness that, as 1731, Bach residing, during its progress, in another we shall see, his superiors once brought him sharply to book. the drudgery of teaching a pack of half-wild boys (all accounts agree that his pupils deserved to be so called), he stood firmly by duties which were more to his mind. A case in point is worth citing.

One of the two churches served by the Thomas boys was St. John's-the church of the Universitywhere, formerly, only a few services took place in the year, the music at these, owing to their dignity as University services, being conducted by the Cantor in person. At a later period, weekly services were instituted, and a special director appointed, the holder of the post in Bach's time being Görner, Organist of St. Nicholas, who received the fees and emoluments. Although requiring the Cantor to take the musical direction of the old or University services, the authorities not only retained Görner as director of the new or weekly services, but gave him the stipend properly belonging to Bach's share of the work. Bach suffered the injustice for two years, and then appealed unto Cæsar, otherwise Frederic Augustus, Elector of Saxony and King of Poland. His letter to that potentate exists in the archives at Dresden, and has been translated as follows:—

"Most Serene, Most Potent King and Elector,

Most Gracious Sovereign-

"May your Royal Majesty and Most Serene Highness graciously permit me to represent with the humblest submission, with regard to the Directorship of the Music for the Old and New Services of the Church in the Worshipful University of Leipzig, that, together with the salary and usual fees, they had always been associated and joined with the place of Cantor at St. Thomas's, even during the life-time of my predecessor; that, after his death, and while the post was vacant, they were given to the Organist of St. Nicholas, Görner; and that, on my assuming my office, the direction of the so-called Old Service was restored to me again, but the payment was withheld and assigned, with the direction of the New Service, to the above-mentioned Organist of St. Nicholas; and, although I have sued duly to the Worshipful University, and made application that the former regulation be restored, I have, nevertheless, not been able to retain anything more thanthat I should have half the salary, which formerly amounted to twelve gülden.

"Nevertheless and notwithstanding, most gracious King and Elector, the Worshipful University expressly required and assumed that I should appoint and direct the music for the Old Service, and I have hitherto fulfilled this function; and the salary which has been given to the Director of the New Service did not formerly belong to it, but properly to the Old Service; and, at the same time, the New were connected with the Old; and, if I were not to dispute the right of directing the New Service with the Organist of St. Nicholas, still the retention of the salary which formerly, and at all times-nay, even before the New cultus was instituted-belonged to the Cantor, is extremely painful and prejudicial to me: and church patrons are not wont to dispose otherwise of what is assigned and fixed as the regular payment of a church servant, either withholding it altogether or reducing it, while I have already, for more than two years, been forced to fulfil my duties concerning the above-mentioned Old Service for nothing. Now, if my humble suit and petition may find favour with your Royal Majesty and Most Serene Highness, you will graciously communicate it to the Worshipful University, to the end that they may restore the former state of things, and assign to me, with the direction of the Old Service, that also of the New, and more particularly the full salary of the Old Service,

But while Bach was ready enough to shirk And for such Royal and gracious favour, I shall ever remain your Royal Majesty's and Serene Highness's most humble and obedient, - JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH.

-Leipzig, September 14, 1745." This wordy epistle might have tempted the official who first read it to refer the matter to a Circumlocution Office, but there does not appear to have been an institution of the kind in Saxony. Bach's complaint was so promptly taken up, indeed, that on September 17 the Ministry sent a letter to the University demanding restitution or explanation. The Leipzig people preferred to explain, and sent on to Dresden a statement of their case, informing Bach that they had done so, but not supplying him with a copy. Upon this our master, resolute as ever, addressed a second letter to the King, in which he said :-

"After that your Royal Majesty had most graciously been pleased to issue your orders in the matter of the request preferred by me, on the one part, and by the University of this town on the other part, the said University submitted the required very humble report, and duly notified me of its departure; and I, on the other hand, for my further need, deem it necessary to observe that if my most humble petition may find favour with your Royal Majesty and Most Serene Highness you will communicate to me a copy of the said report, and be graciously pleased to wait and defer your sovereign determination till I again have made the necessary representations; and I will not fail to hasten with them as much as possible, and for the whole of my life remain, with the deepest submission," &c., &c.

Again Bach was favourably heard. The Ministry sent him a copy of the University's case, which he proceeded immediately to answer in a statement so long that it cannot be reproduced here. Enough that the Cantor met his opponents point by point, winding up with a stern demand for justice even to the last fraction of unpaid arrears. "Be graciously pleased," he wrote, "immediately to command the University that they not only acquiesce in the previous order of things, and henceforth confer upon me the full payment, consisting of 12 florins, for the Old Service, together with the fees for the Promotiones Doctorales and other solemn occasions formerly attached to it, but also that they shall hand over to me the arrears of honorarium, amounting to 18 thalers, 5 gr., and the regular salary already owing, amounting to 33 fl., and, moreover, allow me all expenses incurred by me in this business.'

On January 21, 1726, the Royal Ministry issued a document which Spitta describes as "not very definite in tone," though apparently conceding Bach's prayer. No doubt some underhand measures were taken, to which may be attributed the non-delivery of this paper till May 23, and, perhaps, the vague conclusion of the whole matter. That the Cantor received his money can only be conjectured, but it is almost certain that Görner remained at the head of the New Service and shared with Bach the duty of composing pieces for solemn University occasions. The exact issue matters little now, and only the proceedings to it have value as showing Bach's sturdy sense of what was due to himself and his office. may add here that the master's position in Leipzig was strengthened three years later when he succeeded to the directorship of a society called the Musical Union, which gave weekly performances throughout the year, and also assisted Bach at the grand services of his own churches.

In 1727, the Cantor had a passage of arms with one of the clergy of St. Nicholas, again in defence of rights and privileges; the vexed question being of a and the enjoyment of the fees accruing from both, kind often arising between organists and their ecclesiastical superiors. Part of Bach's duty, it appears, was to select the hymns for service use, and, in the discharge of it, he did not always confine himself to the authorised collection. This came to the ears of the Town Council, who warned the consistory that it must not be done, and caused that body to transfer the hymn-choosing to Gandlitz the sub-dean. Bach submitted for a year, and then broke out into open rebellion, ignoring the sub-dean altogether, and making the choir sing what hymns he pleased. Gandlitz, horrified at such presumption, invoked the consistory, by whom Bach was commanded to submit. But in this they reckoned without their host. The refractory Cantor had no idea of submitting, at any rate till he had again appealed unto Cæsar, otherwise the Town Council. Here is the letterwordy as usual—in which he stated his case to that august body :-

"Magnifici, most nobly-born, most Noble, Powerful, High, and Learned and most Wise, most Honourable Lords and Patrons:

"Will your Magnifici, well-born and noble Lordships condescend to remember how I was admonished by your Magnifici, well-born and noble Lordships, on the occasion of my being called to the Cantorate of the School of St. Thomas in this place, of which I was always to perform the traditional usages in the public divine service, duly in all respects, and not to introduce any innovations; and how, under the same contract, you were pleased to assure me of your high protection. Among these usages and customs was the right of ordering the hymns before and after the sermons, which right was left entirely to me and my predecessors in the Cantorate, provided that the hymns chosen be in conformity with the Gospels and the use of the Dresden hymn-book regulated by these, and as may seem suitable according to time and circumstances; and, certainly, as the worthy Ministerium can well attest, no contradiction to this has ever arisen. But, to the contrary of this, the Sub-Diaconus of St. Nicholas Church, Herr Magister Gottlich Gandlitz, has attempted to introduce an innovation, and, instead of the hymns hitherto ordered in accordance with Church customs, has ordered other hymns, and when I scrupled to yield to this because of serious consequences which might result, he brought an accusation against me before the worshipful Consistorium, and obtained an injunction against me, by the contents of which I, for the future, am to let those hymns be sung which shall be commanded by the preachers. But it seemed to me not proper, without the knowledge of your Magnifici, well-born and noble Lordships, the patrons of the churches in this place, to carry this into effect, and all the less so because hitherto the arrangement of the hymns by the Cantor had for so long a time remained undisturbed, the aforementioned Herr Magister Gandlitz having himself allowed, in the document presented to the most worshipful Consistorium, of which a copy is subjoined, that, when once or twice he had been allowed to do it, my consent as Cantor had been required. In addition to which, when the hymns which had to be sung as part of the church music were of inordinate length, the service would be prolonged, and thus all kinds of irregularities would have to be provided for, putting aside the fact that not one of the officiating clergy, with the exception of Herr Magister Gandlitz as Sub-Diaconus, seeks to introduce this innovation. Thus, I esteem it necessary most submissively to bring before your Magnifici, well-born well-born and noble Lordships' most obedient,— JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH.—Leipzig, September 20, 1728." Concerning the issue of this quarrel as little is known as of the end of the University squabble. But again we see Bach firmly standing upon his rights, even where little save dignity was involved, and taking his cause before the highest authority, with a boldness which was really heroism, none the less because liable to misconception as impudence. It is probable that he took nothing by his appeal to the well-born and noble Lordships of the Leipzig Town Council, for, in truth, those magnates by no means approved his ways, being to some extent, moreover, right in disapproving. There is strong moreover, right in disapproving. evidence to the effect that Bach was not a good schoolmaster. A genius such as he found no pleasure in teaching rudiments to ill-disciplined boys. He more and more neglected the school lessons; he practically ignored the admonitions of the Council, and generally so provoked the "well-born" ones that they spoke of him as an "incorrigible." The natural result was that their "noble lordships" began to retaliate, and made Bach's pocket the object of attack; sequestrating the Cantor's income as far as they had power to do so, which, happily, was not to a great extent. Bach may have cared little for the lost cash, but the Council struck him also on a point decidedly tender. At Easter, 1729, nine new boys were to be elected on the school foundation, and it was important for the Cantor's purpose that they should possess musical qualifications. Accordingly, the master examined the candidates, and drew up a report from which it appeared that ten offered themselves as musicians, and eleven did not. What did the Council in this case but proceed to thwart their official by nominating four of the non-musical boys as against five chosen from Bach's list, thus weakening the choir in a serious manner; and doing so, Spitta points out, shortly after the first performance, in St. Thomas's Church, of the Passion according to St. Matthew.

This rebuff, and much kindred treatment, so worked upon our Cantor's mind that he resolved to quit Leipzig as soon as an opportunity offered. None presented itself, and Bach then took the unusual course of writing to his old friend, Erdmann, asking if a place could not be found for him in Dantzig. The letter has been preserved, and is so interesting that, despite its length, we must quote it entire:—

"Excellent and Respected Sir,-Your Excellency will forgive an old and faithful servant for taking the liberty of troubling you with this letter. Nearly four years have now elapsed since your Excellency did me the pleasure of kindly answering my last sent to you; though, as I remember, you were graciously pleased to desire that I should give you some news of my vicissitudes in life, and I hereby proceed to obey you. From my youth up my history has been well known to you, until the change which led me to Cöthen, as Capellmeister. There lived there a gracious Prince, who both loved and understood music, and I thought there to spend my life and end my days. As it turned out, however, his Serene Highness married a Princess of Berenberg, and then it appeared as though the musical disposition of the said Prince had grown somewhat lukewarm, while, at the same time, the new Princess served as an amusement to him, and it pleased God that I should be called to be Director Musices and Cantor to the Thomasschule in this place. At first it did not altogether please me and noble Lordships the humble prayer that you will to become a Cantor from having been a Capellmeister, most graciously protect me in the use and ordering and for this reason deferred my decision for a quarter of these hymns, as has hitherto been usual. And, of a year; however, the position was described to with life-long devotion, I remain, your Magnifici, me in such favourable terms that finally (and especially as my sons seemed inclined to study here) I ventured upon it, in the name of the Most High; I came to Leipzig, passed my examination, and then made the move. And here, by God's pleasure, I remain to this day. But now, since I find (i.) that this appointment is by no means so advantageous as it was described to me; (ii.) that many incidental fees are now stopped; (iii.) that the town is very dear to live in; (iv.) and that the authorities are very strange folks, with small love for music, so that I live under almost constant vexation, jealousy, and persecution, I feel compelled, with God's assistance, to seek my fortune elsewhere. If your Excellency should know of, or be able to find, a suitable appointment in your town for your old and faithful servant, I humbly crave you to give me the benefit of your recommendation. Nothing shall be wanting on my part to give satisfaction and justify your favourable recommendation and intercession, and to use my best diligence. My present position secures me about 700 thalers, and when there are rather more deaths than usual the fees increase in proportion; but it is a healthy air, so it happens, on the contrary—as in the past year—that I lost above 100 thalers of the usual funeral fees. In Thuringia I can do more with 400 thalers than here with twice as many, by reason of the excessive cost of living. I must now make some small mention of my domestic circumstances. I am now married for the second time, and my wife died in Cöthen. Of my first marriage three sons and a daughter are living. My eldest is Studiosus Juris, the other two are one in the first, the other in the second class, and my eldest daughter is still unmarried. The children of my second marriage are still little, the eldest, a boy, being six years old. They are all born musicians, and I assure you that I can already form a concert, both vocal and instrumental, of my own family, particularly as my present wife sings a very clear soprano, and my eldest daughter joins in bravely. I should almost overstep the bounds of politeness by troubling your Excellency any further, so I hasten to conclude with most devoted respects, and remain your Excellency's life-long and most obedient and humble Servant,—Joh. Sebastian Bach.—Leipzig, October 28, 1730."

As regards its immediate purpose, the foregoing letter was written in vain. There was work for the master yet to do in Leipzig, and he remained to do it.

THE EFFECT OF THE FUGAL IMPULSE UPON MUSIC:

By JOSEPH GODDARD.

THE GENERAL DEVELOPMENT OF MUSIC IN THE HANDELIAN PERIOD .- THE PECULIAR FITNESS OF THE FUGAL STYLE FOR ENTERING INTO RELIGIOUS CEREMONIAL,

The several advances which we summed up in the previous chapter led uninterruptedly to the art development of the period of Handel. The fundadevelopment of the period of Handel. mental steps of this development are as follows:-

1. Dramatic expression in melody.-We have said that the discovery of the true principle upon which harmony should be applied to melody, the principle, clear harmonic progression.—The following example of intensifying the pitch-design-which was led to by the it is a perfect development of counter melodic effect.

had the distinct effect of extending its form-of giving to it new and more delicate inflections in innumerable variety. The development of melody was still further stimulated by its application to dramatic circumstances, which ensued in the cultivation of Italian Opera. In this atmosphere of passion and poetic feeling, melody became necessarily fraught more intimately with expression; and harmony, which at first gave to melody simply strength and clearness, became the means of enhancing inordinately its beauty, and heightening its poetic power

2. The development of the choral .- Just as in the case of the operatic melody, so, applied to the choral-theme, harmony had arrived at much more than strengthening the thematic outline. It had arrived at even more than enhancing the beauty of this outline and deepening its expression-although this was its principal effect at the period we are now treating of-for we meet, in some examples of the choral, with design and idea in pure harmonic change -a vista of effect which M. Gounod has opened out recently-a salient instance of originating power in We cite the following august example of this form of expression :-

3. Counter melodic effect, involving with the subject viz., of strengthening the intention of the melody— this kind of effect is also in advance of the period: discovery of the chord of the Dominant 7th, not only and yet this form of effect constitutes an aspect of favoured generally the development of melody, but nusical growth peculiar to the present period—

We may here observe that it is quite possible that examples of polyphony may be found which, for a certain time, involve definite harmonic progression, and the question may be asked—where, in such cases, does the effect differ from counter-melodic effect?

The same question might be asked with reference to the subsequent style of which we are about to treat-viz., the fugal style involving regular harmony. There is no difference between the construction fundamentally of these forms of effect, on the one hand, and counter-melodic effect on the other; but between them, as regards ultimate manifestation, there is a prevailing distinction. An important feature in fugal effect, whether involving definite harmony or not, is equal demonstrativeness of the various parts. where one part is rendered prominent for a time by appearing alone, equality is subsequently restored by the other parts appearing alone in turn. On the other hand, in counter-melodic effect one melody is, as a rule, subservient to another. The example just given is a somewhat exceptional instance of the melodies being even in intrinsic importance. In the following example, which belongs to the present period, the melody of the accompaniment waits, so to speak, upon that of the vocal part, subsiding when the latter is prominent, and emerging when it subsides

In the following example the accompanying melody is the leading melody, although in the last bar the two melodies assume even importance—

From this difference between the two kinds of construction under consideration, there follows another. In counter-melodic effect, harmony for special expression may be used; the prominence thus occasioned in the part to which such harmony is applied, and the evident adaptive modification of the other part or parts, being suited to the genius of this style. Equal demonstrativeness of the parts is then a distinguishing feature of the fugal style, whether the construction involves definite harmonic progression or not, whilst the display of a particular part is, as a rule, a characteristic feature of counter-melodic effect.

4. Another mode of construction, which we may describe as a combination of plain harmony and counter-melodic effect, had attained development in this period. We term this form ornate harmonic construction. It differs from plain harmony, in that the parts so move as to execute short detours around the special notes of the harmony, or in the course of passing from one special note of the harmony to another. It approaches counter-melodic effect, in that this local movement frequently involves a certain melodic design. The synchronising motion of the different parts are sympathetic and compensatory. We may add that chromatic enrichment plays an important part in this effect. This mode of construction figures largely in the works of J. S. Bach, from whom we cite the following example-effect.-We find at this period that not alone melody is strengthened and enhanced through harmony being so applied as to render decided the impression as to tonality, but that the fugal enweavement of melody is rendered clearer by the same cause. The fugal writing of the period we are now treating of involves definite harmonic progression. However complex may be the concatenation of themes, they involve a flow of fundamental harmonic effect of which the ear realises the order without effort. Thus, with the sense of the complex, there is also present the impression of order. This form of musical construction, polyphony under harmonic control, possesses a peculiar interest. It is a structural process which occupies the central place in musical development; it is also a fundamental feature of construction in those great efforts of this period which are monuments of art, and but for which musical art would not mean what it does-would not be to us what it is. This form of construction is exemplified in the choruses of Handel.

Our sense of the greatness of the genius which produced these works is deepened by the consideration that, in the form of composition they involve, harmony, though it plays a great part, still exercises a limited function, this function (we are referring to the fugal portions of the works in question) being mainly to render clear the progress of the subjects. For this form of composition, that power which harmony has, of giving special expression to melody, is not available. At a point where several interlacing themes meet, even if, by a coincidence, a chord, giving special expression to one theme, were applicable to the others, the theme to which special expression was given, would be singled out to the attention, and thus the grand principle of fugal writing—viz., equal importance of the parts—would be sacrificed.

Thus far, then, it would appear that in connection with fugal effect, controlled by harmonic laws, melodic impulse is still enwrapped by the fetters of inchoate form, through which expression cannot break fully—that here we have the higher power of melody arrested by a traditional process—a process to which harmony can give fundamental clearness, but not all that weight and significance which it can impart to unfettered melody.

Nevertheless, this fact-viz., that harmony cannot exert its highest powers in the fugue-is, in certain circumstances, rather advantageous than the reverse. How this is so, we shall now proceed to show.

The fugal style, though it involves simply definite harmonic progression, supplies certain essential conditions for art display. The effect of this thematic enchainment may be compared in certain respects to that of passing through forest scenery. In the latter experience, the eye only takes in a few of the details. The attention may be fixed upon a particular objecta tree, for instance—and this may be observed in close detail; but the main impression of such a scene is composite and general. At the same time, we know that in the whole effect there is an infinity of detail; we also know and feel that there is no confusion, and nothing inexplicable, but that everything is perfectly ordered to the most minute degree. Thus, though the eye takes in but a few lineaments, these are the signs, so to speak, of a vast array of effect; and whilst our conception of this effect is as of something unlimited in extent and infinitely complex, we are quite clear as to its nature and scope.

There is a certain likeness of these facts in the case of listening to a fugue of the Handelian period. We need not realise at every moment the precise relation of the themes; we may only hear this or that phrase in detail at a particular time; yet, not- of a number of people. Further, just as in the latter

5. The application of harmonic principles to fugal withstanding we may only follow a single phrase in detail amidst great extensiveness and complexity of effect, we are quite clear as to the nature and scope of this effect-we feel that harmonic order controls the whole.

We are now in a position to perceive what a large and important element polyphony, involving harmonic clearness, supplied to the art of the Handelian period. Diffusiveness and surplusage are to be avoided in music as in language; still, in both language and music, lengthiness to a certain point is necessary. Without a certain length there can be no climax. But more than length is essential. It is a law of all forms of feeling, that massiveness of influence is fundamentally gratifying. The more imposing aspects of both nature and art possess massiveness, extensiveness, richness of detail. Thus it is that although this element of phenomenal fulness does not suffice alone to constitute art, and whilst it must be portion of an organic unfolding, or growth of effect -of a cumulative influence, of which every part is essential to the whole-there is still in all important displays of impressive art more than the faculties can realise in detail: along with the feeling of a general controlling principle of order there is a feeling of redundance of phenomena-a sense of overwhelming power. Now, polyphony, involving harmonic clearness, supplied to musical art at the period in question, and in modified form has mainly supplied since, this great and indispensable element of elaboration.

Before the harmonic period, as we have seen, this element existed in plenty, but, among other effects, had a confusing influence upon the faculties. The repetition and intertissue of subject, whilst it gave a certain impression of unity, could not be followed sufficiently in detail by the ear to give the impression of clearness. A considerable portion of the effect was felt as unexplained. But when elaborate tonal enweavement involved definite harmonic progression, the net-work of phrases was felt as so much detail in a structure having an ordered foundation. Though the ear cannot follow every part in the complex sound-effect, the mind is clear as to the general origination and tendency of every part. If there were a person to whom a tree or plant was utterly strange, both as to features and principles of growth, and such a person were to view a mass of tangled forest, he would probably have, along with other feelings, a feeling of confusion; whilst to a person familiar with the forms of plants and trees-cognisant of their tendencies and the general conditions of their existence—the whole effect would be clear; however complex it might be, it would produce in him no feeling of confusion. The consciousness of harmonic progression in fugal effect has, so to speak, an explanatory influence in the case of the ear, somewhat in the same way as the consciousness of the normal ordered relation of natural objects has with regard to a complex display of such objects, in the case of the eye.

The fugal style of this period, besides affording the necessary space, or, what we may term, the necessary vitalising environment for art-life, has another and a peculiar function. Music and language are effects which touch in certain places. In both, changes in time, as appreciated by the ear, are an essential part of the effect. Accentuation is common to both, so also is the abstract fact of change in pitch. A musical strain is thus always half felt as an utterance. Thus the differently timed entrance of the various voices in a fugue, the apparently irregular occurrence of imitative effects, the variously timed phrases, and the antiphonal effects-all this involves a general likeness to the exclamations, comments, questions, and answers circumstances one remark may be the modified repetition of another, whilst a second may be an expression from a different point of view, and all these remarks have the character of individual expressions; so, in the kind of music we are considering, one phrase may be the modified repetition, or the supplement, of another, whilst a third may contrast strongly with both, all three retaining melodic individuality. Thus it is that this style of musical effect involves a resemblance, as regards general conformation, to the spontaneous expressions of a body of people.

There is one occasion in life which consists of the exclamation and general solemn outpouring of a body of people—viz., the religious occasion; and this out-pouring is assisted in a remarkable degree by the style of which we are treating. The circumstances, be it observed, are not art reflecting a reality of life as in the case of the drama, but art becoming portion

The more enlightened eye sees in the praise and thanksgiving of religious ritual, the joy of life seeking a source to which to direct thanks; sees the deep enthusiasm of the impressionable nature, seeking outlet in homage to a Most High; or, it may be, the gratitude flowing from intense relief at emergence from some one of the various serious passes of life. But the religious ceremonial takes in the depressed, as well as the enthusiastic side of feeling. Of all public acts of life, the religious act alone embraces the outpouring of the heart which "knows its own

Now the sympathy between this general occasion and a form of art peculiarly adapted for multitudinous expression, such as the fugal form, is obvious. The religious ceremony, moreover, whilst it is sometimes expressive of the different feelings, or the different shades of feeling of individuals, is at other times occupied by a single broad sentiment. These circumstances are also reflected in the developments of the fugal style, of the period to which we are referring; for, whilst these developments in one place are fugal, in another, when the parts come together, they partake of the form of the choral, so appropriate for simple broad expression.

There is another fitness in the fugal style of art entering into the ceremony of religion. We have referred to the fact that through the melodic constitution of this style the harmonic treatment has little further force than to render the general effect clearthat it is not planned to give special expression to particular themes, because this would interfere with that even manifestation of the parts which is an essential feature of this style. Now, when these various outlines of the structure are each associated with a particular burthen, that, so to speak, impartial character of the harmonic treatment which we have just referred to, combined with the effect of the interfering of one theme with another, involving divided attention, tends to give to the musical expression of these burthens a certain character of removedness from ordinary melodic effect, such as the vivid melody of song. Each theme having thus a divided melodic force, as well as a harmonic treatment aiming only at clearness, its expression partakes of a certain calmness-has a certain dispassionate characternot inappropriate in the manifestation of the religious

ENGLISH AUDIENCES.

It is impossible for any one whose experiences as the North and South of England, to avoid comparing their organ rather than those of art, and critics, notes as to the varying attitude in different districts of that important section of the musical body politicthe non-performing public. Such a comparison, if made with impartiality by a competent foreign critic, might prove an extremely interesting and instructive study. But even a native cannot help being struck by very obvious divergencies, the more salient of which it is our purpose to offer for the consideration of our readers. Facilities of locomotion and intercommunication doubtless have worked, and will continue to work, wonders in the way of smoothing down local peculiarities and angularities. When these amount to boorishness and brutality it is natural and right to hope for their speedy removal. But local colouring is a fine thing in its way, and, provided it does not degenerate into eccentricity, invaluable to art just in the same way that a variety of type is consistent with the normal development of species.

There is, however, such a thing as unity amid diversity, and certain prevailing characteristics are to be noticed amongst all English audiences, metro-politan or provincial. They are not all of them pleasing characteristics, nor do we lay claim to any originality in discovering them. So far from that being the case, two of them were acutely noted by Jullien a generation or so back. In the course of a conversation with 'a famous pianist upon musical careers, Jullien-who, in spite of his foppery and fine waistcoats, deserves to be held in grateful recollection for his services in the cause of popularising good music-made the following incisive remark, "To succeed as a musician in England, one must either be a great charlatan, like me, or a great genius, like you"; a candid declaration, showing that he possessed a far truer estimate of his own powers than most persons would have been inclined to credit him with. In other words, English audiences, or the bulk of them, while seldom failing to render fitting homage to indisputable talent, exhibit an ill-judged enthusiasm in their attitude towards the extravagances of genius, or the impostures of mere cleverness that apes genius, which demoralises the former and encourages the latter, while it bewilders thinking foreigners, unable as they are to reconcile such vagaries with the sobriety of our national judgment. It is this idiosyncrasy of ours which explains the fact that besides the admirable and honoured foreign executants who have taken up their abode amongst us or pay us frequent visits, we harbour not a few aliens who trade, and with handsome profits, upon the gullibility of the fashionable world, warbling untranslatable love songs with an intensity of spurious passion that may impose upon silly sentimental women unskilled in foreign tongues, but only revolts any right-minded auditor, be he musical or not. And yet in a reflex way we ought to be grateful to these gentlemen, for if they did not exist, and furnish him with food for laughter, Mr. Corney Grain, like Othello, would find his occupation gone. Nevertheless, for the advancement of good musical art, it would be better that the abuse ceased to exist rather than that it should afford scope for satire, however entertaining. Our second indictment against le gros public, as Berlioz styled it, is that its toleration is far too elastic. This fault is obviously closely connected with that we have just touched upon, for toleration is often directly due to credulity. But the special toleration we wish to single out for complaint is that accorded to performers of established repute. They are considered, we suppose, to have won their It is impossible for any one whose experiences as spurs once and for all, and, like the king, they can a constant Concert-goer have been fairly equally do no wrong. They may interpolate, tamper with divided for the space of ten years or more between the composer's score, consulting the interests of audience, conductor, all are "dumb dogs," to quote a phrase much in vogue just at the present date; or if they do protest it is with such an uncertain sound as to leave little doubt that the offender will repeat the obnoxious practice at the earliest possible opportunity. In respect of gullibility and toleration the Northern public compares favourably with that of the South; but the difference is only of degree after all, and is due probably to lack of opportunity. For the musical quack is hardly known outside London—he is the exclusive product of a more fashionable society than that which any pro-vincial town can boast — while in the favour extended to purely ad captandum performances, the best Northern critics and audiences are in no wise in advance of their Southern brethren. In the asperity of its comments upon rising artists we have never met anything to surpass the paper which is generally considered to stand at the head of the provincial press. On one occasion, a few years back, the defective production of a young contralto was described in its columns as creating the same effect as though she sang through her ears. This struck us at the time as a trifle brutal, and we would not now recall a criticism which seemed to transgress the canons of courtesy, which is always compatible with outspokenness, were it not for the additional point which it lends, by contrast, to the following illustration of our former remarks as to misplaced leniency, also drawn from the same paper. The subject of the criticism in question was the performance of a song by a popular prima donna, whose looks are unquestionably better than her intonation, and in the course of his remarks the critic observed that if one shut one's eyes, it seemed that the lady was not singing strictly in tune, but on opening them, and looking at her, one felt convinced that such a thing was impossible. When we add that these notices were invariably written with a thorough technical knowledge of the subject, and great acuteness of perception, these strange lapses become all the more inexplicable. The charm of personality is most subtle and powerful, but it should not be allowed to sway a musical critic to the extent of causing a temporary suspension of his æsthetic faculties. Here is another sample culled from a Lancashire paper:-"She possesses a personal appearance and demeanour, well calculated to captivate the popular eye." A third speaks of the "gnome-like appearance" of a notable pianist. A critic's duty in these cases, we take it, is to solve, as far as in him lies, the artistic equation of the performer. But into this process no personal considerations whatever should be allowed to intrude. To admit them is to subvert the whole foundation on which sound criticism rests. The fact that they are admitted, and that the taint of personality often infects press notices, we hold to be an unwholesome sign of the times, and one for which Society journalism is largely responsible.

the delight they apparently take in witnessing a great difficulty successfully surmounted. This is often a genuine and thoroughly legitimate feeling, for the Greeks, who were no mean judges in matters of art, held, and held rightly, that nothing noble could be achieved without labour. But the labour should be antecedent to the final manifestation, and not betray itself in the violent straining or grimacing which are so often involved in the efforts of a popular artist to gain a round of applause by exaggerating the climax, or creating one where the composer never intended it. This is not an unfitting opportunity to denounce a practice which, though doubtless due, in the last resort, to this popular passion for laborious climax,

We mean the habit adopted by some artists of undersinging the greater part of a song in order to husband their powers for an unexpected, and therefore all the more electrifying, display at the close. Why is it that a C in alt, if a soprano can depend upon giving it with a moderate amount of precision, almost invariably brings down the house? Not because it is an agreeable sound even in our best singers, but because a mighty effort is needed, and England expects every singer to do his or her duty in that respect at the close of their performance, if possible. Much in the same way conversationalists are advised by Lord Chesterfield to take their departure immediately after letting off their choicest mot, that nothing may detract from the favourable impression they have This absurd love of climaxes finds its reductio ad absurdum in many modern ballads where the anticipation that the singer will end up by "letting a great screech out of herself," as the Irish say, keeps the sensitive listener in a state of agonising suspense. The rigorous fulfilment of the composer's intentions in a song where there is no great crescendo, or high or low note, may satisfy the conscience of the performer, but it is not likely to win the plaudits of the multitude. Singers, even great singers, will create climaxes, as we have hinted, where none exist, a notable instance of this having recently occurred in the case of Bach's "Mein gläubiges Herz," where, at the close, the ascent to the octave from the leading note was substituted for the characteristic falling seventh. This liberty, it is only fair to admit, was severely animadverted upon at the time by the critics, who were not deterred by the well-earned repute of the artist from condemning what Berlioz, in his exaggerated way, called "one of the most enormous of crimes, because aimed at that union of the highest faculties of mankind called genius."

Thus far we have confined ourselves to the discussion of those characteristics which, so far as our experience goes, are to be found in all English audiences, irrespective of locality, though they may differ in degree. The task has not been very agreeable, but we have performed it to the best of our ability, being well aware that such continued faultfinding must savour of hypercriticism. The remainder of our remarks shall be devoted to a comparison of audiences, an operation proverbially odious, yet in this case not altogether without its bright side, as we hope shortly to prove.

If many performers, and especially singers, prefer a Lancashire or Yorkshire audience to any other, the cause is not far to seek. They are sure of a heartier and more demonstrative welcome than that accorded to them in London, for instance, simply because the lower classes constitute a larger proportion of the appreciative Concert-going public in those counties than perhaps anywhere else, and express their approval with a warmth and vigour that is positively magnetic. We thrill with the mere memory of the fierce clapping that has often greeted Mr. Santley in the Free Trade Hall in Manchester, at the close of "Is not his word like a fire?" in the "Elijah." The question whether sacred works should be applauded or not has often been debated, and decided in the negative on some parts of the Continent, but we feel sure it will take a great deal of training to abolish these impetuous outbursts, which may offend the fastidious critic, but are inexpressibly refreshing to the performer after the languid demonstrations of a more fashionable audience. Many of Mr. Hallé's most constant patrons are common artisans, and some have been known to walk for miles from outlying towns when they could not afford their railway fare in addition to the price of admission. Many is not one whit the more excusable on that account. of these are amateurs in the truest sense of the word, and their attentive demeanour and silence during the | the more artificial life of the capital, Londoners being, performance, in spite of the discomfort involved in standing in a dense mass for at least three hours, have often excited our admiration. An amusing feature of these Concerts is the Northern frankness with which the occupants of the shilling seats express their disapproval of the stampede which invariably sets in amongst the stall-holders about half-an-hour before the close of these Concerts, and which has always been to us one of the most convincing proofs that musical Manchester, outside the large section of foreign residents, must be sought in the middle and lower classes. Such a scene as was witnessed in St. James's Hall last year, when the general sense of the house was in favour of the repetition of a certain number-a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt, as well as we can remember—but the majority somewhat tamely suffered themselves to be overridden and hushed down by the critical few, would have been absolutely impossible in Lancashire. There le gros public would have had its way irrespective of the feelings of its social superiors; of course, that is to say, if the conductor had consented. And inasmuch as they are the most appreciative section of the audience they would be fully justified, in such a hypothetical case, in ignoring this extension of the principle of minority representation and insisting on the recognition of that of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. The simple fact is that in the North of England the audiences at high-class Concerts are largely democratic in their constitution, while in the metropolis, democratic and demonstrative audiences do not frequent performances of so high a standard of merit. To take a practical instance, the social status of those who occupy the area and gallery seats at the Richter Concerts is vastly superior to that of those who would pay the same price at a Northern Concert of the same character, and such gaps as have been occasionally apparent in the seats above the orchestra, bad as those seats are for hearing, would have been filled twice and three times over by men of the working classes had St. James's Hall been in Manchester and not in London. Another instance of the application of the democratic principle in the North is the selection of programmes by plébiscite, which has worked with great success in Scotland, but which is hardly likely to commend itself to Southern audiences. In the matter of untimely or premature applause, if we set aside the trained audiences, such as those of the Popular Concerts and the Free Trade Hall in Manchester, we are inclined to give the preference to the North over the South. Nowhere have we heard the closing symphonies of the numbers of "The Messiah" more barbarously broken in upon than by a well-dressed and presumably well-bred audience in the Princes' Hall this Spring. On the other hand, we know of a great Northern manufacturing townthe roughness of whose inhabitants is proverbial even in their own most loyal county-where by the liberality of a great iron-master excellent Concerts are organised at cheap rates, chorus and band being almost exclusively composed of his employés, and where the audience have been taught to reserve their plaudits until the last note has died away, allowing a second or two of silence to follow, and then expressing their satisfaction with true Lancashire hearti-

In spite of the more genuine feeling for music which exists in the lower social strata of Northern England, new works, even of undoubted merit, have a better chance of recognition before a London audience than anywhere else. And yet this fact need not necessarily reflect credit on Southern audiences if the explanation we offer is correct. For in the integrity with which they pass their artistic judgfirst place, there is a greater demand for novelty in ments.

like the Athenians of old, above all things anxious to see or to do some new thing. And, secondly, the critics and cognoscenti are a large and influential class, and society is not slow to mould its judgment upon that of its teachers and to flock in the train of their musical bell-wethers, to hear the latest new thing or to affect a deep interest in it, whether they have heard it or not. Nothing is more exasperating than to listen to the rapturous expressions of delight to which some persons give vent in speaking of the music of Wagner, though they have not a tithe of the training or knowledge which render a full appreciation of his works possible. The extraordinary variety of impressions produced upon those present at the performance of Parsifal, given in the Albert Hall last winter, as illustrated by the writer's own experience, is enough to furnish material for serious reflection. Thus we heard one lady describe herself as having been in the seventh heaven of delight all through; another auditor, a really gifted musician, spoke of the indescribably religious atmosphere which pervades the whole, while a third felt revolted by its sensuous Paganism, and a fourth compared his feelings to those of a traveller who had successfully but laboriously achieved a journey across a "howling wilderness, a grand musical Sahara, gladdened here and there by green oases of melody." Much of the enthusiasm evoked by Wagner is genuine and legitimate, but a good deal is affected because the attitude of Wagner happens to fall in with that of a literary and artistic movement which has for its object the erection of a religion of humanity, the resurrection of what a modern writer calls the "admirable Paganism" of the Greeks, and which would be prepared to accept as its motto these lines by a well known living poet :-

Though the feet of thine high priests tread where thy lords and our forefathers trod, Though these that were gods are dead, and thou, being dead, art a god, Though before thee the throned Cytherean be fallen, and hidden her head, Yet thy kingdom shall pass, Galilean, thy dead shall go down to thee

For the foregoing reasons, foremost among which is the cause that in the North the majority of Concertgoers form their own opinions in a more independent and conscientious fashion than that adopted by our more fashionable Southern audiences, new works are less likely to create a furore on a first hearing by a Northern audience; but if they once succeed in becoming popular, that popularity is of an abiding sort because it is based on the unbiassed liking of le gros public, and not on the policy of follow-myleader. An excellent instance of this statement is to be found in the success achieved by Berlioz's "Faust" in the North of England, where we have been present at seven performances of that original and remarkable work, and have observed with great interest the progressive appreciation of its merits. The Hungarian March, The Sylphs' ballet, and Mephistopheles' Serenade, have all been almost invariably encored, but the essentially humorous passages, and in particular the whole scene in Auerbach's cellar, seemed to cause greater amusement at every successive hearing, and points formerly missed, or only noticed by a few, were taken up by the bulk of the audience. That this freakish vein in the composer should be the last to be appreciated has always struck us as characteristic of the North, whose sons are not always remarkable for the delicacy of their perception. But they certainly excel us in the heartiness, loyalty, and

SINGING MADE EASY By HENRY C. LUNN.

In spite of the axiom that "knowledge is power," it is astonishing how many people manage to acquire power with scarcely any knowledge at all. It is of course good to feel that you have legitimately earned a value in the estimation of the world; but the number of persons who will accept a man at his own valuation is very much larger than is generally believed. Persistently persevere in telling the public that you are celebrated, and those even who have never heard of you before will soon begin to believe it. A thoughtful and sceptical few will occasionally desire some guarantee of your talent; but these you can easily spare if the thoughtless and credulous many can be secured. All in the habit of reading the advertisement columns of the newspapers cannot but be struck with the fact of this principle being acted upon most extensively in the present day. ailment incident to humanity, although baffling the most skilful and eminent doctors, can be at once cured by application to a person whose name is utterly unknown in medical circles. Persons who, by the fact of their advertising, prove that they cannot make their own fortunes, benevolently undertake to make them for other people, because they alone possess the secret of investing money without the slightest risk; and, in fact, every individual can be led with the utmost safety to health and happiness for the remainder of his days, if he will but have faith in his guide.

secured by placing your confidence in one of whose antecedents you know nothing, but in educational matters the road to excellence is made equally accessible by the same means. Music, more especially, is accredited professors do not understand. A certain number of lessons, "on a natural and simple method," are all that are necessary; and if you will apply, without loss of time, to the advertiser, years of arduous study will be saved. Sometimes the number of lessons it will be necessary to take is not stated; but a prospectus now before us goes into all the details, and honestly tells us how much can be acquired in a given time. "A scholar," it says, "cannot learn to sing the easiest piece in less than six months, with three lessons a week. With two lessons a week he may be able to sing in nine months.' The professor who issues this somewhat elaborate address also informs us that he receives pupils for a theatrical career gratis, "but on condition that they have sufficient means to procure good nourishment, and to be exempt from hard labour. For these the age would be from twelve to twenty-eight years, if females; if males, from fourteen to thirty years." He then proceeds to discourse upon the training of the voice, and says that the public has always confounded a music-master with a singing-master. "Music-masters there are in all the world; singing-masters may be counted on the fingers." As one the world will be somewhat narrowed. But as the secret of the systems adopted by these teachers is rigidly kept from the general public, it will be good to take advantage of the revelations of one who has himself tested them-translated by B. Lützen, from the French of Oscar Commettantmerely adding that, although recording the methods practices are quite as much resorted to in England. The first "celebrity" to whom the student applied commenced the conversation by asking, in a stern thrive, upon.

voice, "Are you aware, young man, what you are doing in coming here?" and on being told that he came for lessons, "That is not so simple as you appear to think," he said. "First of all, young man, you must swear by all that is most dear to you, by the eternal beauties of art, to submit to all my prescriptions, without ever uttering one single word." This being agreed to, he was requested to lie down upon a mattress, which was placed upon the floor, and inhale and exhale according to some very inconvenient rules of the professor's own invention. When, after a few days, the mattress was removed his teacher sang to him a recitative with a "hollow, hoarse, lamentable voice, which would have been admirable in an Opera-bouffe, personifying Winter suffering from a cold." He then asked his pupil to sing; and on hearing him, benevolently said that he "neglected his left lung," and then horrified him by opening an antique cupboard, exhibiting a complete human skeleton. "He was," he said, pointing to the skeleton, "one of my best pupils, whom I cherished most dearly, for whom I still weep; but like you, young man, he wrongly distributed the air between his lungs; he went into a consumption, and it brought him to his tomb! Let this be a lesson to you." It was; and he instantly changed his master. This one declared he instantly changed his master. This one declared the mattress to be a "detestable invention," and put a gag into the pupil's mouth, which enlarged it frightfully, declaring that he could change a voice as easily as he could change a coat; but to effect this important result it would be necessary to practise two hours a day with the gag in his mouth; and, if Not only, however, can riches and a long life be it did not inconvenience him, to keep it there whilst sleeping. Earnest as the would-be vocalist was to acquire the art he so loved, this régime he found too much for his constitution; and he then went to a sible by the same means. Music, more especially, is teacher who began by saying that all singing-an art the teaching of which we are constantly told its masters were "asses," because they made their pupils try to sing instead of to study anatomy. After these few words, a servant brought in a large dish with a calf's head on it. The professor, without losing any time, took hold of a scalpel and commenced the lesson thus: "To modify the human vocal apparatus so that it approach as near as possible that of the calf is the point on which the singer ought to concentrate all his efforts; but to modify thus the human organisation requires a long, constant, and intelligent labour. What I dream of is the natural qualities of the calf at the service of the genius of the artist." As he could not be convinced that the aim of the vocalist should be to imitate a calf, the perplexed student sought other masters, but with no better reresult. One made his pupils stand in the four corners of the room and sing the upper E natural—tenors, basses, and baritones taking the same note—the effect of which, heard at a distance, was so like the moaning of human beings in agony that the police had already entered the house to enquire the cause of such noises. Another had in his room an instrument of torture somewhat resembling a long chair. The pupil squatted down underneath this chair, the head between two bars, his neck stretched out, the finger must, of course, be reserved for the author of eyes lifted upwards, and in this position he was these remarks, the number of singing professors in obliged to sing the scales with all his might, the supposition being that any one who could sing well in that position would not feel uncomfortable when singing anywhere. This, of course, we can readily imagine; but as our great vocalists have not been formed by this or any other system we have described, it seems strange that persons should still be found to believe in them. The facts here related, of some Continental professors, such eccentric however, speak for themselves; and until the millenium arrives, we fear that there will be an ample supply of dupes for pretenders to live, and even to

of a "Comic Concert," the principal performers in which were selected from the "Music Halls," which were then rising into popularity, and even, as several persons feared, rivalling the theatres. We went with no prejudice for or against the entertainment, determined to give applause if anything demanded it, and to laugh if there was anything to laugh at. The general air of dulness which prevailed throughout the room, however, very soon infected us; and we have no hesitation in saying that, in common with hundreds of others, we passed one of the most mournful evenings of our life. Since then, in quoting from the memoirs of the late Mr. Bernal Osborne, a writer in the Daily News alludes to an unpublished letter from Charles Dickens respecting the relations between the Music Halls and the Theatres; and in this communication, written in 1865, Mr. Dickens says: "In principle I am for free trade in popular amusements, and in practice I believe that the conversion of music halls into theatres would do a great deal of good. It would take the theatrical 'trade' out of a few hands, and give increased employment and gain to a great number of struggling people, and would bring into wholesome competition with ill-conducted theatres, that have gradually brought themselves down, some enterprising men with capital at their disposal and a good knowledge of the public." As the writer in the Daily News, however, truly remarks, the views of Mr. Dickens as to the extension of places where the regular drama was performed have since then been carried out, not by converting music halls into inferior theatres, but by the building of more theatres, leaving the rivals to "variety entertainments" and "refreshments." After all, the people are the best judges of what they want; and although no doubt the licensing magistrates are very well meaning men they usually fail when they attempt to enact laws for the regulation of the pleasure of the public. Those who attended, as we did, a model "Comic Concert" will believe, with ourselves, that the music halls have declined, even in the estimation of their best patrons, simply in consequence of the inanity of the entertainments they offer.

Ir is unquestionably true that after you have devoted a large amount of time to acquiring the art of playing upon any one instrument, years must elapse before you have had experience enough to know how to teach this art to others. We remember once, on expressing surprise to a person that he should undertake to give instruction on the guitar (knowing that he was not a performer upon it himselt) being told by him that he overcame any little difficulty that might arise from his ignorance of the subject with his first pupil by procuring an Instruction-book and "keeping one lesson in advance." Like the ambitious amateur who, with a greased violin-bow, took his place in the orchestra as a high-class executant, and was only found out by once being called upon to play his part alone, the guitar professor we have mentioned must often have been dangerously near discovery; but only those who practise such deception really know how very long, with a fair stock of assurance, you can continue to trade upon false pretences; and it must be recollected that every day he was strengthening his ground by gaining some little knowledge of the instrument he professed to teach. The columns of the Times inform us daily of the number of ladies who undertake to give lessons on very moderate terms in every subject included in an English education; but persons who put their faith in these announcements have really no right to complain

Many years ago we wrote an account in this journal | this kind, strictly confined to the subject of music, are constantly to be met with; but the following, from a provincial paper, is, we think, unique: Mr. ____, 25 years Teacher of Piano, Harmonium, Violin, Singing, Flute, Banjo, Guitar, Piccolo, English or German Concertina." This reminds us of the prospectus of Mr. Squeers, who, after saying that every branch of study is taught at his school, adds: "Single-Stick, if required."

> For some time we have had concert programmes forwarded to us from various parts of the world, elegantly and appropriately illustrated, and in every respect so attractively got up as to form a souvenir of the performance fitted for the drawing-room table. To these, of course, we can offer no possible objection; but some specimens which have reached us within the past month, daubed over with the most glaring colours, without, as it appears to us, any definite design; and others-published in our own countryin which eccentric and shadowy figures are dancing about immediately under the names of the accompanist and conductor, with a row of coloured lamps hanging on a string at the top of the programme, can scarcely, we think, appeal to such an audience as an artist would wish to assemble at his concert. Another, and more appropriate, idea is well carried out in one now before us, which is printed on yellow paper, in the form of a book. In this we have quotations from Shakespeare on each page, all of which are most judiciously selected. For example, "Every man must play a part," from the "Merchant of Venice," illustrates the list of executants; "Sit you down in gentleness," from "As you like it," is placed at the commencement of the programme, and other equally apposite extracts appear throughout the list of pieces to be performed. But unfortunately the whole merit of this idea is marred by mottoes from the poets before tradesmen's advertisements, "Boil thou first i' the charmed pot," from "Macbeth, being chosen for the announcement of a wonderful tea; "And Enid fell in longing for a dress," from "Idylls of the King," being printed on a page devoted to the interests of a Costume Emporium, &c. When will caterers for the public understand that no good can result from dragging these commercial appeals into a purely artistic atmosphere?

As we find it impossible to do more than make a selection from the enormous amount of music sent for review; to satisfy one fourth of our correspondents who play or sing in public and forward us notices of their successes wherever they appear; or to answer the many questions addressed to us—some medical, some musical, and some personal-connected remotely with the art, we feel that a few words to our readers, now and then, may save them the trouble of writing letters to our office inquiring the reason why we throw their communications aside, and also relieve us from the necessity of replying to them individually. In the first place, let it be thoroughly understood that all music sent for review receives due attention, and that when notices on compositions appear many months after they have reached our office, or no notices appear at all, a very sufficient reason could be given. With regard to the performances of public artists who send us accounts of all the Concerts at which they played or sungthose portions relating to themselves being scored under with a thick pen, and accompanied with a reminder that they are subscribers to our journalwe always adopt the principle of inserting only one or two from the packet. And, lastly, whilst always ready to reply to any queries of general interest we when they find that such utterly impossible pledges ready to reply to any queries of general interest we are not satisfactorily fulfilled. Advertisements of beg to give a specimen (recently received) of those which we decline to answer: "Dear Sir,—Will you be so kind as to tell me where Mr. Barton McGuckin was taught singing? how long he has sang in public? and what town in Ireland he came from? also what profession were his parents? Can tell why tobacco is injurious to the voice? and oblige, yours truly,—." It may be well to say that this letter is only one taken at random from a large store.

Our attention has been called to a paragraph in the Globe of the 17th ult., headed "Over-cheap Music," in which the decline of the Birmingham Musical Association, in consequence of the falling off of the "threepenny public," is adduced by our con-temporary in triumphant proof of its conviction that there is little or no demand among the working classes for good music. Now, in face of this insinuation, we should like first of all to refer the readers of the Globe to the figures given in our last issue, in connection with working men's Concerts in Manchester. And, secondly, we venture to suggest that the conclusion of our contemporary is based upon unproved assumptions. If it can be shown that there has been no falling off in the quality of the music performed by the Association of late seasons, and, further, that there has been no decay of the cordial relationship previously existing between all the workers in the cause, well and good. But if, on the other hand, as we surmised in the article on "Music for the People," already referred to, there has been any deterioration in the one case, and any disruption in the other, the frank Philistinism of the Globe loses all its sting.

We have much pleasure in conveying to our readers a piece of information upon Gounod's "Meditation on Bach's First Prelude"—copied from the "Analytical Notes" appended to the programme of a provincial concert—which we are certain cannot fail to surprise them: "This exquisite melody was written by Sebastian Bach, and the accompaniment, by Bach's dying request, was entrusted to Gounod." Will the critic who penned these lines permit us to present him with the following quite unknown and equally interesting fact? When Mozart's "Messiah" had grown to be a popular work, the composer, feeling that the score was thin, and that his own powers were failing him, besought Handel to put additional accompaniments to the Oratorio, saying, with tears in his eyes, that he would entrust his work to no other hands.

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL. (By our Special Correspondent.)

In our notice of the last of these great musical gatherings, in 1882, we alluded to the responsibility resting upon those who have the direction of the preliminary arrangements; for not only must the artists requested to supply new works be such as have legitimately gained a world-wide name, but in some instances implicit confidence in their power to produce such compositions as are suited for the Festival can only be inspired by the success of those of a different character which have preceded them. In the case of M. Gounod, of course, this latter difficulty applied not on the present occasion; yet the extraordinary sensation created by his sacred Trilogy, "The Redemption," at the last meeting, perhaps, rendered the task of selection even more perplexing, for it became obvious that nothing short of a commission for a work of equal importance from the same pen would satisfy public expectation, and unless liberal and ready aid to secure this could be obtained, one of the strongest Festivals on record might be succeeded by a comparatively weak one. Luckily, however, ample help from the same source as before was forthcoming, and the result is the Oratorio "Mors et Vita." the profoundly thorough sympathy with the mind of the composer of "The Redemption." For some months the design and outline of the libretto have been before the public; but as in the published edition of the Oratorio M. Gounod speaks for himself on the subject, we cannot do better than quote his words: "This work," he says, " is the continuation of my sacred Trilogy' The Redemption.' It will perhaps be asked why, in the title, I have placed death before life. It is because in the order of eternal things death precedes life, although in the order of temporal things life precedes Death is only the end of that existence which dies each day; it is only the end of a continual 'dying.' But it is the first moment, and, as it were, the birth, of that which dies no more. I cannot here enter into a detailed analysis of the different musical forms which express the meaning and idea of this work. I do not wish to expose myself to the reproach either of pretension or of subtlety. I shall, therefore, confine myself to pointing out the essential features of the ideas I have wished to express; that is to say, the tears which death causes us to shed here below; the hope of a better life, the solemn dread of unerring justice, the tender and filial trust in eternal Love." Of the representative themes used throughout the Oratorio, which are given in music type in the Preface, the composer says that the first is intended to express "the terror inspired by the sense of the inflexibility of justice, and, in consequence, by that of the anguish of punishment. This melodic form, which is employed both in ascending and descending order, presents a sequence of three major seconds." The second, "that of sorrow and tears, is transformed by the use of the major key, and the alteration of a single note, into the expression of consolation and joy." The third "expresses the happiness of the blessed"; and, lastly, the melodic form, "which, by means of threefold superposition, gives the framework of an augmented fifth, announces the awakening of the dead at the terrifying call of the angelic trumpets, of which St. Paul speaks in one of his Epistles to the Corinthians." Of the exquisite manner in which these four striking subjects are treated we shall speak in reviewing the per-formance of the work. So sublime a theme as "Mors et Vita," it must be admitted, would tax the highest faculties; for not only a tone-poet, but a tone-priest is demanded to embody in such music, as will deepen the effect of the Scriptural text upon every hearer, a chain of events before even the thought of which we can only bow with rever-ence. But that M. Gounod, in the endeavour to give utterance to his religious yearnings, did not miscalculate his artistic powers is now effectually proved; and "Mors et Vita" has taken its place as another of the many successes of its gifted composer, and as one more proof of the judgment and energy exercised by the Festival authorities in the performance of their onerous duties.

It might be supposed that the name of Antonin Dvorák, whose "Stabat Mater" laid the foundation of his fame in this country, would naturally occur to those desirous of engaging the great representatives of art to contribute towards the Festival; and, wisely therefore, he was promptly applied to. That he at once accepted the commission may have been fairly anticipated; for not only has England been foremost in acknowledging his genius, but, as a guest, he has been warmly received here, and, although now recognised throughout the world of music, he is not a man to slight those who, in the early part of his career, have, both artistically and personally, shown their high appreciation of his worth. As we have already mentioned, the work chosen by a composer for a Festival may not be of the same character as those by which he has made a name in this country; and when, therefore, Dvorák decided to write a secular Cantata a certain amount of anxiety might reasonably be felt by the Committee as to the result. The triumphant reception of "The Spectre's Bride," however, is sufficient evidence that the confidence reposed in him was well founded; and, as he has already achieved an enduring success here in a sacred work, we are glad to find that he selected our great English Festival to prove the versatility of his powers.

a comparatively weak one. Luckily, however, ample help from the same source as before was forthcoming, and the result is the Oratorio "Mors et Vita." the profoundly religious subject of which, it may well be imagined, was in position from his pen, and perhaps no subject could have been selected more suited to his melodious and genial style than that of "Sleeping Beauty," a theme already treated by Balfe, and now thrown into a dramatic shape, consisting of a Prologue and four scenes, by Mr. Francis

The name of Dr. Villiers Stanford is one which could scarcely be omitted from a scheme which, whilst recognising the genius of foreign creative artists, should also be thoroughly representative of that which exists in our own country; and in contributing a work of such dimensions as his Oratorio, "The Three Holy Children," there can be little doubt that the composer fully acknowledged the importance of the occasion.

Although Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," which he was composing for the Norwich Festival at the time preparations were commenced for the Birmingham meeting, prevented the possibility of his writing a great choral work, it is satisfactory to find that he is represented on the occasion; and certainly, considering that he is a skilled violinist, studying, when a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, under M. Sainton, no more appropriate composition could have been suggested than a Violin Concerto, especially when its merits are revealed by so consummate an artist as Señor Sarasate. Mr. Mackenzie also contributes a Scena written for Mr. Lloyd, the words by Mr. T. Spencer.

It remains only to mention Mr. Thomas Anderton, whose Cantata, "Yule-Tide," formed a portion of the secular performances, and Mr. Ebenezer Prout, who contributed a Symphony-the first ever written for a Birmingham Festival-both these works fully sustaining the high reputation of their respective composers, and amply justifying the members of the Birmingham Committee in their reliance upon talent so universally and deservedly recognised.

The death of Sir Michael Costa, who has been for so many years identified with this Festival, demands an expression of sincere regret from all who know how much the success of the meetings depended, not only upon his able conductorship, but upon his personal influence in organising those innumerable details connected with the musical arrangements, the good effect of which was generally admitted and thoroughly appreciated. The election of Herr Richter as his successor could scarcely, perhaps, be expected to pass without comment; but it must be remembered that, although a German, our knowledge of his powers rests not upon German report. In our own country he has fairly earned a name as a high-class Conductor of high-class compositions; and it was known, therefore, that in electing him to the vacant post every work performed under his direction would receive the earnest and painstaking care of a truly reliable artist. The Festival began on Tuesday, the 25th ult., with

Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah," a work welcome indeed wherever given, but doubly so in Birmingham, where its manifold beauties were originally revealed under the composer's direction, and where many-including the veteran organist, Mr. Stimpson-can recall the scene of intense excitement on the memorable occasion of its first perform-The inauguration of the present meeting by an Oratorio which has now been before the world for thirtynine years may be accepted as an undoubted proof, not only of its enduring power, even in these days when conflicting theories on the true mission of music are springing up around us, but as a tribute, in memoriam, to a foreign artist who thus dedicated one of the highest efforts of his genius to the English nation. Herr Richter's entrance into the orchestra was greeted by an outburst of enthusiastic applause; and the National Anthem having been given, with fine effect, Mr. Santley's delivery of the opening Recitative announced the commencement of the first work of the Festival. As all the principal vocalists— Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley—were the same as those who sang in the Oratorio at the last meeting, in 1882, little need be said of the manner in which the important solos were sung. A word of praise, however, is due for the valuable aid rendered in the Double Quartet by Mrs. Hutchinson, Messrs. Bragg, F. King, and Watkin Mills, the services of some of these singers being also given in other portions of the concerted music. The the accompaniment. In this piece the words of the doom choral singing throughout the work was fully up to the are accompanied by the motive already mentioned, the highest standard of the Birmingham choir; indeed, the leads—under the unerring beat of Her Richter—were simply perfect, the great Chorus, "Thanks be to God," producing a thrilling effect, partially marred, however, by the usual rustling of dresses accompanying the movement of those who, in their hurry for lunch, forgot the respect due to Mendelssohn and Mendelssohn lovers.

The first part of the Concert in the evening was devoted to Mr. Cowen's Cantaa "Sleeping Beauty," composed expressly for the Festival. The libretto, adapted for musical setting by Mr. Hueffer, is extremely well laid out for the purpose, the versification being easy and flowing throughout, and the story, although certainly differing from that which children, at least, will maintain to be the right version, having quite as much interest as we are night version, naving quite as much interest as we are accustomed to expect in fairy legends. Following modern precedent, perhaps too slavishly, Mr. Cowen's work is bristling with "representative themes," the attention of the auditor being constantly kept alive to trace these phrases wherever they occur, even sometimes at the expense of the very beautiful abstract music with which the composer illustrates the various phases of his story. In the Prologue, which commences with a few bars of orchestral Introduction, followed by a choral Recitative, we have three subjects afterwards heard in the work. This is followed by a charmingly fairylike and delicately accompanied chorus in A major, "Draw the thread, and weave the woof," commenced by the twelve Fays invited by the King to the christening of his infant daughter. The tenor and bass voices afterwards join, to the accompaniment of a portion of what we may term the "Love" motive. The opening three notes of the chorus being then thrice heard in the orchestra, the voices continue with detached passages, until a sudden change in the character of the music prepares for the entrance of the Wicked Fay, who utters the warning as soon as she appears, a contrasting theme which we presume may be accepted as that of the evil omen, being afterwards cleverly worked with the "Love" motive already mentioned, the scene indeed containing dramatic music of a high order. In the Orchestral Interlude, which follows this, preceded by a brief tenor solo, we have the whole of the "Love" motive which is shadowed forth in the first chorus, a beautiful flowing melody in E major, after which the tenor solo is resumed in D major, the same motive is given in various keys in the orchestra; and, after a return to E major, with another short tenor solo, the subject dying off in the orchestra, effectively concludes the Prologue. Scene I introduces us to a hall in the King's Palace, beginning with a festive chorus in B flat, preluded by a brief instrumental symphony, to greet the entrance of the King and Princess. This choral piece has a pleasing subject in waltz rhythm, which is afterwards made a prominent theme in the work; and, apart from the excellent vocal writing in the movement, warm praise must be given for the clever and varied accompaniment, which enriches without disturbing the melodious flow of the voice The next number is a Scena for the King, Princess, and Chorus, and commences with the opening instrumental phrase of the Cantata. The King then, in a bold Recitative, tells how the cloud which for years overshadowed the path of his child has now vanished; but whilst he sings, the motive which represents the warning of the Wicked Fay is heard. This is followed by a bright chorus, "Long live the daughter of our King," and a very fine solo for the King, with which the chorus unites; this movement, indeed, being one of the best in the work. Phrases of dance-music are then heard, and the Princess wanders dreamily from the banqueting hall, the music gradually growing fainter until, ending upon the dominant, the next number commences with a solo for the Princess, in C. This soliloquy of the maiden is full of beauty, both in the voice part and orchestral accompaniments, a good effect being gained by the strains of dance-music being heard in the distance, and ceasing as the Princess enters the turretchamber and closes the door. In Scene 2 the Wicked Fay, disguised as an old crone, is at the spinning-wheel; and, after a brief duet, the Fay sings a ballad in D minor, the effect of which is much heightened by a quaint figure in

Princess mechanically repeats them, and, after some clever vocal writing, the spindle pricks the finger of the poor victim (fulfilling the words of the "warning"), and she falls back in a swoon, whilst the Fay utters some few phrases in triumph. The Incantation Scene follows, and this, it is unnecessary to say, can be but feebly described, the colouring of the orchestra—in the details of which Mr. Cowen has indeed fully proved himself a master throughout the work-being so important an element in the general effect as to render it impossible to separate the vocal from the instrumental portions of this highly interesting number. We may say, however, that it commences with a solo by the Wicked Fay, "Spring from the earth, red roses," the beauty of the melody being materially aided by the florid figure of accompaniment; the theme is then taken up by the basses, and the solo being resumed, is responded to by tenors and basses in unison, an effective and highly dramatic climax being gained (with a free use of the "Doom" motive), the movement ending with the ominous words "She must die." A Choral Interlude, in E flat, illustrative of the sleep of the Princess, King, and Courtiers, now occurs, forming not only an effective contrast with the exciting movement which precedes it, but with its beautiful orchestral accompaniment, containing reminiscences of representative themes, being most charmingly descriptive of the quiet which reigns throughout the On the dominant harmony of A flat major, a choral phrase in unison then announces that the sleepers are under the spell of witchcraft, and after asking who will awake them, a signal is heard. At the commencement of Scene 3, in the Hall of the Castle, as before, this signal grows louder (the notes being the same as those beginning the "Love" motive), and is afterwards combined with the theme representative of the Good Fairies, which occurs in the opening chorus of the work. At the end of this orchestral piece, the Prince enters, and in a series of recitative passages calls upon the sleepers to arouse, but, finding no response, he hurries to the turret-chamber in search of the beautiful Princess foreshadowed in his dreams, the sound of the horn signal dying off as he reaches the room. The fourth, and last, Scene begins with the entry of the Prince into the turret-chamber, where the Princess lies asleep on a couch strewn with rose-leaves. A beautiful theme from the orchestra prefaces the passionate utterances of the Prince, as he kneels before the Sleeping Beauty; and, after a fine solo—appropriately beginning and ending with the "Love" motive—he kisses her, and she awakes. An excellent dramatic effect is here gained by the resumption of the dance music precisely where it left off in the first scene, and its continuance through a portion of the following duet, the "Love" theme afterwards stealing in, and being given in its entire form to the Princess where she declares her affection. The duet which succeeds this is made up chiefly of passages already heard; the dance theme and chorus is then resumed, and a bright and jubilant coda concludes the work. Mr. Cowen's graceful and melodious music received ample justice from the principal vocalists. Mrs. Hutchinson's pure voice and cultivated style invested the part of the Princess with much interest, her scena where she wanders from the banqueting hall and her solo on awaking from her long slumber being sung with much earnest feeling and unexaggerated expression; Madame Trebelli was sufficiently impressive as the Wicked Fay; Mr. Lloyd (the Prince) received quite an ovation after his fine and impassioned delivery of the solo addressed to the Princess in the turret-chamber: and Mr. F. King, as the King, gave the whole of the music allotted to him with excellent effect. The choral portions of the work evidenced the result of very careful preparation; and the composer, who conducted, had every reason to be gratified with the spontaneous marks of genuine apprecia-tion of his artistic labours which greeted him throughout, as well as at the conclusion of, his Cantata. In the second part of the programme notice is only demanded for an important Scena, "Love lost on earth," the words by Mr. T. Spencer, composed especially for Mr. Lloyd by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, who conducted the work. The verses pathetically tell the story of one who within a sacred edifice dedicates his life to heaven, in memory of a being loved and lost on earth, and earnestly entreats that he lasting life. The piece opens with an impressive Largo in B flat minor, an instrumental Introduction effectively leading to the voice part, beginning and ending upon the dominant harmony, which is prolonged in the orchestral part, and succeeded by a passionate Invocation, commencing on the words of the title, in the tonic major. The alternations of feeling are faithfully reflected both in the vocal and instrumental parts throughout, a change to the relative major, and back to the tonic major, with an agitated triplet accompaniment, being points of much interest, the oft repeated words "I call on death," at the conclusion, being set with a musical eloquence evidencing a high sense of dramatic effect in the composer. Magnificently sung as it was by Mr. Lloyd, the scena created a marked effect, both vocalist and composer being recalled to the platform and enthusiastically applauded. Señor Sarasate's playing of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Saint-Saëns's Intro-Mencisson's violin Concerto, and Saint-Saens's Into-duction and Rondo Capriccioso, Madame Trebelli's singing of the Brindisi from "Lucrezia Borgia," and the perform-ance of Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," by the band, were of course most welcome items in a really attractive programme, and were all received with much applause.

It is almost needless to say that a thoroughly apprecia-tive audience was attracted by the first performance of Gounod's new Oratorio "Mors et Vita." on Wednesday morning; and that with the recollection of the extraordinary effect produced at the last Festival by the great French composer's "Redemption," the anxiously expectant auditors required but the first uplifting of Herr Richter's bâton to centre the whole of their attention upon the music with a reverence and earnestness which cannot but be accepted as the fittest tribute to the solemnity of the

Respecting the design of the work, we have already allowed M. Gounod to speak for himself, and have now to record the truly admirable manner in which this design has been carried out. Those who know the earnestness with which the composer throws his whole nature into the musical embodiment of a religious theme can scarcely wonder that he would ever rest content with merely setting a sacred libretto prepared to his hand; and, as in the case of "The Redemption," therefore, he has himself compiled the text, chiefly from the Scriptures, but with a few extracts from St. Augustine. The work-very wisely sung tracts from the Augustine. The with an English translation in the Book of Words—is divided into three Parts, the first, "Mors," preceded by a Prologue, and concluding with an instrumental Epilogue; the second, "Judicium," descriptions. instrumental Epilogue; the second, "Judicium," descriptive of the Divine Judgment; and the third, "Vita," the motto "Cœlum novum: novam terra," embodying the subject of this final section, the realisation of the Christian faith, as set forth in the Apocalypse. We have M. Gounod's own authority for stating that "Mors et Vita" is a continuation of his "Redemption," and so in truth it must be considered: but no more convincing proof of the trained artistic mind of the composer need be adduced than the dissimilarity of the treatment of the two works. In our criticism upon "The Redemption," on its production, we particularly dwelt upon the judgment shown in moulding the libretto into a dramatic shape, not only the various scenes illustrated, but the personality of those who take part in them, imperatively demanding such form; but the sequel has nothing save the partial connection of the subject to link it with the earlier work; for in "The Redemption" we have a narration of sacred incidents vivified by the colouring of the musical artist, whilst in "Mors et Vita" the eloquence of music is employed to deepen the devotional feeling evoked by a calm contemplation of the great and accepted truths of Christianity. It has already been shown that the composer has availed himself of the modern device of using "representative themes," but beyond this bond of union with other writers of our day, the style is wholly and solely that of M. Gounod, wealth of melody, real sympathy with every portion of the text, rich harmonic combinations, variety of orchestral colour-which, indeed, can be but faintly indicated, even in the minutest notice-and the most perfect symmetry in the plan of the several movements, being so strikingly manifested throughout the work as to prove not only that his resources are inexhaustible, but that his highest powers are called forth may be released by death, and rejoin his beloved in ever-leads him to reflect the severe ecclesiastical school heralded by Palestrina where such treatment seems congenial to his text, but to shake off all slavish adherence to cherished models whenever and wherever a brighter setting of the words appears to him more appropriate.

The work opens with a Prologue in C minor, a few bars of introduction, on a tonic pedal, leading to a choral passage in unison, at the conclusion of which the first of the representative themes, which we may here appropriately term the "Death" motive, followed by two wailing chords from the orchestra, expresses the solemn text, "Horrendum est incidere in manus Dei viventus" ("It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God"). After two repetitions of this phrase, each time a semitone higher, the key changes to the tonic major, when the hopeful words of the Redeemer—" Ego sum Resurrectio et Vita"-accompanied by horns, trumpets, and strings, are heard in a declamatory passage for baritone, which being afterwards sung by the full chorus brings the Prologue to an impressive close. The Requiem for the Dead, which really commences the first part, is preluded by an instrumental Adagio and Andante in C minor, the latter beginning in the form of a strict Fugue, but shortly interrupted and leading through a dominant pedal to the choral utterance "Requiem æternam." At the poco piu mosso the second representative theme occurs in the orchestra. This subject, which M. Gounod tells us is expressive of "sorrow and tears," forms a fitting accompaniment to the monotone phrases of the vocal parts. A charming Quartet in A flat, repeated by the choir in G, and a melodious soprano solo, responded to by the other voices, are followed by a resumption of the "Death" motive by the choir, given thrice, as before, but this time a whole tone lower on each repetition. The opening theme of the Requiem, sung by the solo voices, then occurs, and is succeeded by the melodious "Kyrie," for occurs, and is succeeded by the included accompaniment. Chorus, in the tonic major, with a florid accompaniment. The fine massive chorus which follows, "A custodiâ matutina usque ad noctem," is written alla Capella, for a double choir, and although a successful specimen of the solid contrapuntal style of the old Italian masters, has something besides this evidence of scholastic knowledge on the part of its composer to recommend it. We have ample proof in all M. Gounod's religious works that he never displays his condition, save where by such means he can invest his text with additional vitality; and we look upon this chorus, therefore, not as a concession to those who believe that for the "true" school of sacred writing we must return to the idiom of former years, but because he had to set these beautiful words with due regard to their solemn import, and has chosen the form which he conceived best suited to the purpose. The "Dies Iræ" commences fortissimo with the "Death" motive, for the orchestra, enforced by the brass instruments, a quiet chorus, with detached chords, leading most effectively to the "Tuba mirum," in which the bold choral unison phrase is accom-panied with trumpet calls, the "Death" motive being heard throughout, with the basses of the orchestra, the masterly handling of this prevailing theme, not only with the basses, but, in contrary motion, with the wood-wind instruments, on the words "Mors stupebit," gently breathed by the choir, evidencing the care with which the composer has thought out every detail of this really beautiful movement. The Quartet and Chorus, "Quid sum, miser," beginning in G minor, and passing into E flat major, charmingly melodious, and placidly accompanied, forms a grateful contrast with the solemn movements which precede it; but the following soprano solo and chorus, "Felix Culpa," in A flat major, is a perfect gem, and produced a thrilling effect upon the auditors. The exquisite strain, sung first by the soprano, afterwards, in varied form and with florid accompaniment, by the chorus, and then by the solo voice combined with the choir, left indeed a deep impression upon the audience; and there can be little doubt that, apart from the work in which it was first heard, the movement will frequently find a place in programmes of sacred music. A duet, for soprano and alto, with chorus, "Quærens me, sedisti," again introduces the first and second representative themes, and the movement, commencing with an effectively written duet, contains some excellent choral writing. This is succeeded by a quartet with chorus, "Ingemisco tanquam reus," in which a chromatic phrase, given out by the soprano voice in F minor, imitated a fourth below by the alto, and replied to by the tenor, leads to a few bars of canonical imitation upon a theme given to the baritone; a melodious strain for the solo voices, in the relative major, commenced by tenor and bass, and joined by the other voices, being followed most effectively by the first entrance of the choir, the key changing to F major, with a flowing arpeggio accompaniment. A beautiful tenor solo, "Inter oves locum præsta," forms an excellent point of repose between the preceding movement and the following, "Confutatis maledictis," in A minor, in which the "Death" motive, with its accompanying plaintive chords, is again heard at the commencement, and leads to a placid and melodious Quartet, the key being changed to G major, and afterwards to E flat, the sudden cessation of the florid accompaniment to which, towards the conclusion, gives place to some detached unaccompanied vocal phrases, most eloquently expressive of the supplicating character of the words. "Lacrymosa," after a few bars of symphony, begins with a choral passage in unison, repeated, according to a favourite plan of the composer, a third higher. An impressive phrase, sung first by the solo Quartet, and then by the choir, with some unaccompanied choral passages on the words "Pie Jesu," finish the vocal portion of the movement, which dies off in the orchestra with the second representative theme, still in the same key as when first heard. The Offertorium, "Domine Jesu Christe, Rex Gloriæ," is a boldly written double chorus, in D minor, an effective diminuendo leading to a soprano solo in the tonic major, accompanied in triplets, and followed by a strict Fugue on a well-marked subject, commenced by the basses, on the words "Quam olim Abrahas," but not developed to any great extent. The "Sanctus," for tenor solo, with chorus, one of those beautiful suave movements which Gounod alone could have written, is remarkable, not only for the exquisite melodiousness of the subject, but for the eloquence of the choral responsive phrases, and the delicacy of the instrumentation; the triplet accompaniment for violins and violas, and the judicious employment of the harps, being in happy sympathy with the nature of the text. The choral "Pleni sunt Cœli" and "Hosanna in Excelsis" conclude the movement with much effect. In the quartet, "Pie Jesu," in E minor, the second representative theme occurs in the major key, not in C, as given by the composer in his preface, but in D, the subject afterwards being heard in E minor and major, in which latter key the movement ends. The "Agnus Dei," in A flat major, is written for solo soprano, with chorus, the lovely theme, on the words "Dona eis"—which the composer tells us represents "the happiness of the blessed"—soaring above the choir with thrilling effect, and the orchestral accompaniments throughout being in true sympathy with the text. To the words "Lux æterna," sung pianis-simo by the choir (before which the "Death" motive creeps in once more, having previously been heard in the basses of the orchestral accompaniment), we have some appropriately quiet chords; and a point worthy of mention is the enharmonic change of the A flat, the last note of the symphony, into G sharp, to commence the orchestral Epilogue, which with a skilful treatment of the first and second representative themes-the latter for the first time in C major-scored with a masterly hand, and supplemented by the organ, most appropriately brings the first part of the work to a close.

The second part, "Judicium," may be said to form a connecting link between the two great divisions of the work, "Mors et Vita," and consists of six numbers, three of which are instrumental. Of the imagination displayed in these orchestral movements, coloured as they are by so great a master of instrumentation as Gounod, it would be impossible to convey more than a faint impression. Of course, handled by an inferior artist, a score containing six trumpets, six horns, four trombones, with even cymbals and side-drums, would merely mean a large accession to the noise so often mistaken for power; but the wondrous blending of the mass of sound—especially in the "Tubæ ad ultimum judicium "—produced an overwhelming effect, and so thoroughly realised the deeply religious nature of the theme that we doubt whether, had applause been permitted, a single mark of approbation would have been elicited from the auditors. The first of these three orchestral movements is a Prelude, "Somnus mortuorum," a placid Adagio, commencing in E major, and changing to A minor, the conclusion of the number creating a feeling of almost painful suspense by closing upon the second inversion of the augmented triad on the third of the scale. The intervals of this harmony commence the following movement, "Tubæ ad ultimum judicium," the gradual entry of the trumpets upon this chord-with its piercing augmented fifth—suggesting, with thrilling effect, the awakening of the dead "at the terrifying call of the angelic ' alluded to in the composer's preface. repeated trumpet-calls, upon a tonic harmony, combined with chromatic runs, this dissonant chord is resumed and persistently repeated against the "Death" motive in the bass, the movement, indeed, as a specimen of forcible and unexaggerated tone-painting being one of the finest in the work. Some detached tremolo phrases commence the next movement, "Resurrectio mortuorum," the trumpet-calls reappear, a subject, in augmentation, from the "Somnus mortuorum" being used as an inner part, and the number ends with a short baritone solo, announcing the coming of the "Son of Man." The next number, "Judex," opens with an important orchestral Prelude containing three themes, the second and third of which (the latter the subject first heard in the Soprano solo of the "Agnus Dei" are played in the accompaniment of the Chorus which follows, the first re-appearing in the few bars of symphony at the close of the movement. "Judicium electorum" is divided into several sections, and although comparatively short, is one of the most deeply considered and impressive of the chain of movements in this part. It commences with a baritone recitative announcing the gathering of the nations, after which the "theme of the blessed" is appropriately used to accompany a longer declamatory solo for the same voice, in D, which, ending on the dominant harmony, leads to one of the most exquisite soprano solos ever written, even by Gounod, the simple purity of which, apart from its abstract musical attraction, invests the words to which it is set-" Beati qui lavant stolas suas in Sanguine Agni"with an earnest eloquence beyond the power of description. A modulation into G introduces the angelic choir (sopranos and altos) on a quiet phrase, followed by the theme already given, in the original key, the soprano afterwards joining the choir with charming effect. The movement concludes with the words "In memoria æterna," sung as a chant by the full choir, unaccompanied. A brief baritone solo prefaces the next movement, "Judicium rejectaneorum," in which the plan of the opening Prologue is almost preserved throughout. The "Death" motive, which has up to this point formed so prominent a portion of the work, appears here, as might be anticipated, for the last time; but the unisonous choral phrase, creeping up a semitone on each repetition, is confined to the tenors and basses. Then, preceded by two bars of recitative for baritone, the tenors and basses sing alternate bars with the sopranos and altos afterwards joining, but still in unison, a return to the trumpet-calls terminating the movement and the Second Part of the delivery of the important declamatory solos, and admirable

The Third Part, "Vita," commences with an orchestral movement most delicately scored, and entitled "Visio Sancti Joannis," beginning with chromatic passages of Sancti Joannis," beginning with coromatic passages or holding notes for the higher instruments, alternated with soft arpeggios for the harp. A baritone recitative then tells of the New Heaven and Earth, a solo for the same voice, "Jerusalem Cœlestis," preceded by a melodious symphony, being a truly appropriate setting of the words "And I, John, saw the Holy City descending of the words." The shoral ("Sanetus" in A major out of Heaven." The choral "Sanctus," in A major, begins with a cantabile subject for the orchestra, with syncopated bass. Six sopranos then utter a simple phrase, repeated a fifth below by the same number of contraltos, to a melodious orchestral figure with arpeggio accompaniment. A beautiful change into C major then occurs, when each section of the choir utters in succession the word "Sanctus," to the interval of a falling fifth, the original instrumental theme being repeated as an accompaniment, a brief subject, with full choral harmony, terminating the movement. A declamatory baritone solo—the "Great voice out of Heaven"-begins the next movement, and this is followed by a unisonous choral passage, harmonised on its repetition, and accompanied with flowing arpeggios, the sublime words of the text being indeed most sympathetically set. A very fine Quartet, "Et absterget Deus," follows this, the consoling words, "And God shall wipe away all tears," being commenced by the soprano, repeated by the other voices, and afterwards in Quartet, the harmonies throughout being in true accord with the subject, and the theme expressive of "Consolation and joy" clinging lovingly around the accompani-ment. When the voices afterwards announce, in alternate phrases, that "Death shall be no more," this theme is again used with exquisite effect, its constant recurrence in this movement, indeed, thoroughly fulfilling its mission. In the two following movements the impressive character of the text is admirably coloured by choral monotone phrases, "Ego sum Alpha et Omega," especially, fully realisang the deep import of the words by the vocal reiteration of the fifth of the scale, with a placid figure in the accompaniment. A fine change now occurs from the key of C to that of B, when the choir, singing the words "Et ero illi Deus," the lovely theme typical of the happiness of the blessed streams from the orchestra with charming effect. A monotone phrase previously heard to the same words, "Ecce tabernaculum Dei," is now sung; and, after some passages of imitation, the movement concludes with a bright chorus in which the sopranos mount up to B, a few bars of symphony at the conclusion introducing for the last time the "Consolation" theme." "Hosanna," the final movement, commences with the exposition of a tonal Fugue; but, like most of the composer's specimens of this class of writing, choral effects apart from what seemed the original design gradually arise; and, with a well developed Coda, the work is brought to a conclusion, leaving upon the mind of the auditors not only a feeling of the deepest reverence for the sublimity of the subject thus vividly placed before them, but of admiration for the genius of an artist who can so intensify that feeling by the mighty power of music.

The absolutely perfect manner in which the Oratorio was rendered, by principal vocalists, band, and chorus, renders it difficult to select special pieces for commendation. Madame Albani's music, however, forms so prominent a portion of the work that we cannot withhold our expressions of the highest admiration, not only for the exquisite manner in which she vocalised the heavenly melodies assigned to her by the Composer—notably, perhaps, the "Felix culpa" and "Agnus Dei"—but for the heart she threw into every phrase of her part in the Quartets, creating indeed so profound an impression upon every one of the vast audience assembled that the very effort to restrain applause seemed more eloquent in its silence than the most enthusiastic marks of approbation. Our high appreciation of Madame Albani's exceptional powers, however, must not prevent a well-deserved meed of praise to Madame Patey, who sang everything she had to sing like a thorough artist; to Mr. Lloyd, whose solo and concerted singing throughout the work was instinct with the deepest reverence for the music; and to Mr. Santley, whose delivery of the important declamatory solos, and admitable service in the Quartets, contributed materially to the general effect of the work. The chorus singing was simply superb, both in quality of tone and truth of phrasing, and the angelic choir, wherever introduced, was perfectly seraphic in its effect upon the listeners, especially where it was woven in with the soprano solo. The realisation of the Composer's marvellous orchestration is something indeed to be proud of; and unreservedly we say that had M. Gounod been present on this occasion, he would have been gratified in the highest degree at the exquisite manner in which the whole of his instrumental effects—complicated as they are—were revealed. To the labours of Herr Richter, who worked hard to ensure the triumphant success achieved, the warmest thanks are due, and we heartily congratulate him upon this gratifying result of his efforts, and the Birmingham Festival Authorities upon their wisdom in securing a work destined to shed so enduring a lustre upon these great musical meetings.

At the Concert in the evening the programme commenced with Mr. Thomas Anderton's Cantata "Yule-Tide," composed expressly for the Festival. The work has no told by a number of kindred and friends gathered together on Christmas Eve. Before mentioning the music of the Cantata it behoves us to award a meed of praise to the authoress of the words, Julia Goddard, who has not only provided the composer with verses admirably suited for the exercise of his skill, but has supplied a group of little poems which fairly claim the reader's attention on their own intrinsic merits. The work opens with a Prologue in the form of a Carol—presumed to be sung outside—preceded by a brief instrumental Introduction. This piece, a quaint and appropriate setting of the words, quietly accompanied, leads to a Chorus of some pretensions, "The snow lies deep," the varied feeling of the poetry being faithfully coloured both by voices and instruments. A tenor Recitative then introduces the "Sailor's Song," a bold and stirring melody, the accompaniment (commencing with a persistent shake on the fifth of the tonic harmony) continuing throughout, in union with the vocal phrases, to depict a storm on Christmas Eve, and the smiling of the sun upon the homeward-bound vessel on the next morning.
The peaceful Chorus which follows forms an excellent contrast with the preceding number, and leads to the most beautiful solo in the work-that of a little child who relates her dream-the pure and charmingly sympathetic treatment of this piece, both by poet and composer, producing a highly favourable impression upon the audience, especially the description of the Holy Christ-child, and the transfor-mation of the flower to a "snow-white dove," where the music most happily changes from common to triple measure. The simple syncopated accompaniment to this little gem, at the commencement, and the delicacy of the instrumentation throughout are points worthy of high commendation. We may here say that a good effect is gained by the solo and choral introductions to, and comments upon, the principal vocal pieces, a feeling of continuity being thus given to the work, which, without this aid, it might be difficult to sustain. Such a solo is that for the bass, "Entranced the listening poet heard" (following the song last mentioned) which is indeed little more than Position mentioned), which is, indeed, little more than a Recitative. A Choral then occurs in which one of the company is requested to tell a ghost story. This is replied to by the contralto, who hints that she can relate a thrilling tale of Iceland, told to her by her father, and being encouraged to do so in another Chorus, she commences "The story of Gudrun." Musically, these three introductory pieces have little interest, with the exception of the last Chorus, "Be it ever so weird," many points in which have decided merit, the feeling of expectation aroused by the promised recital of a harrowing narrative being well expressed, and the maestoso theme, to the words, "Our hearts are brave as we sit by the fire," being most appropriately bold and decisive. Into the contralto solo and chorus which relates the story, the composer has thrown all his talent, the placid opening in E flat major, "Gudrun she waited on Christmas Eve," accompanied at first by detached chords, and becoming gradually more agitated until, on the unexpected harmony of B flat minor, the appearance of "the horse and its rider" is announced, evidences real dramatic feeling. It may be questionable whether the choral interruptions to this solo either aid its effect or carry on the idea that it is a tale told to a group of eager listeners; but as abstract descriptive music they merit commendation, especially the concluding chorus, "Gudrun is saved," in which the escape of the maiden by her unconsciously tol-ling the "Lychgate bell" is coloured by the composer with much graphic power. As this is, in its main points, the same legend as that which has been chosen for musical setting as "The Spectre's Bride," by Antonin Dvorák, it is but fair to Mr. Anderton to say that in selecting his subject he was perfectly unconscious that the Bohemian composer's Cantata was founded upon a similar story. To this effect he has already written to the papers; and we may here say that we most unhesitatingly admit his statement. After this exciting number prefaces a well-written Quintet, "Some say that ever sody, however, was finely rendered and warmly applianded gainst that season comes," in which Shakespeare's well-known words are appropriately and melodiously set. After known words are appropriately and melodiously set. After a brief instrumental Intermezzo, a solo, with chorus for commissioned for the Festival was given, a Violin Concerto, (to resume our notice of the work), a short soprano solo dramatic design or continuous story. Interest, however, is female voices, breathes forth a prayer for peace and good kept alive throughout by a series of tales and adventures, will on earth, both the vocal and instrumental parts of this little piece being in admirable keeping with the words. The Quartet and Chorus, "Gloria in Excelsis," which concludes the Cantata, shows that the composer has studied in a good school without having become unduly "scholastic." Some good imitative points are scattered throughout the movement, the part-writing is clear, and the instrumentation, although sufficiently full, never over-powers the voices. The work, which was conducted by powers the voices. The work, which was conducted by Mr. Stockley (who had an overwhelming reception on entering the orchestra), was admirably rendered, the solo vocalists—Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. F. King, and Mr. Watkin Mills—exerting themselves to the utmost to ensure its success. Mrs. Hutchinson, in the graceful ballad sung by the child; Madame Trebelli, in the solo, with chorus, "Gudrun she waited on Christmas Eve"; Mr. Maas, in the Sailor's Song; and Mr. F. King, in the solo "Entranced the listening poet heard," were extremely effective, and earned well-deserved applause. The composer was called forward at the conclusion, and received with every mark of favour. The first part of the programme concluded with a Symphony in F major, by Mr. Prout, composed for the Festival. Whether the choice of the work commissioned for the occasion was left to the composer we know not; but, if so, thanks are due to Mr. Prout for furnishing so important a contribution. The unison phrase, for violoncellos, clarinets, bassoons, and horns, with which the Introduction commences, is extremely melodious, the treatment of this phrase in full harmony, and heightened in effect on its re-entry by some excellent contrapuntal writing, is sufficiently interesting to ensure the close attention of an audience, the bright opening of the "Allegro con brio" gaining much in effect by this well-contrasted preparatory movement. The principal subject (with the episodes growing naturally from it) and the second, a flowing melody in the dominant, are worked with remarkable skill in the second part, the recapitulation also being highly interesting, not only by the weaving in of portions of the first and second subjects, but by the repetition of the introductory theme with full instrumentation. The second movement, "Larghetto espressivo," in B flat major, has a plaintive principal theme, which, with varied instrumentation, is frequently heard; the episodes and second subject having much grace and elegance. The third movement, "A l'Espagnol," an Intermezzo in D minor, is suggestive throughout of the most characteristic Spanish dances, and has some very clever instrumentation, especially for the wood-wind; a point also to be mentioned being the employment of three drums as solo instruments. The Finale, in F major, has an exceedingly bold and effective principal subject, admirably scored, the second enective principal subject, admirably scored, the second theme in the dominant being given to the wind instruments, delicately accompanied by the strings. The re-introduction of these subjects, after some excellent contrapuntal writing, is extremely good; a coda, with an allusion to the primary theme, bringing the work to a highly effective conclusion. In every respect this Symphony reflects much credit upon a composer who is rapidly making his way to the front rapk of our native. is rapidly making his way to the front rank of our native creative artists; and although, perhaps, some surprise may be felt that a writer of such pronounced "advanced" tendencies should produce a composition founded on what are termed the "old lines," we are here bound to consider the work, and not the worker; and that the verdict of the audience fully accorded with our own was proved by the warm applause which greeted Mr. Prout on the conclusion of his Symphony, which he conducted with much ability. We know not who was responsible for the alteration of the order of pieces in the second part of the programme; but certainly, without any notice being given, the performance of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in place of Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte," so that many of the audience were left in the dark as to what was really being played, was, to say the least of it, a proceeding which could hardly be expected at a Birmingham Festival. The Rhapcomposed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, and performed by Señor Written by an accomplished violin-player, it Sarasate. may be imagined that the passages, although presenting innumerable difficulties, were such as an artist like Sarasate would feel a pleasure in surmounting; but it is scarcely necessary to say that the work is of a character to challenge criticism upon higher grounds than those of mere effective technical display; and although it cer-tainly requires more than one hearing fully to judge of its merits, its success was most decisive. Beginning in C sharp minor with a striking passage for clarinets, bassoons, violas, and violoncellos, the violin soon enters, with some effective dramatic phrases, the first subject, commenced with the orchestra, being joined by the solo instrument, and continued with most delicate accompaniment. The second subject, in the relative major, is a cantabile theme of much beauty, announced by the violin, and repeated by the orchestra. After an effective change of time, episodical passages, an orchestral statement of the principal subject, or the dominant harmony of the relative major, and a bravura passage (quasi cadenza ad libitum), we have repetitions of the previous thematic material, cleverly varied and modified-an excellent point being the re-introduction of the first theme by the violin, whilst the orchestra shadows forth the second subjectand after a brilliant Cadenza a brief Tutti effectively con-cludes the movement. The Largo follows without a break, commencing with a melodious theme in A major for the solo instrument, preceded by a figure prominently re-introduced in the course of the movement. In this opening theme we have a somewhat elaborate accompaniment, with changes of tempo. This is followed by an episode, and a second melody constructed from the commencing four bars of the movement, an interrupted cadence leading us into C major, in which an important episode occurs. The movement, although not written in regular form, is extremely effective. A piccolo, triangle, and three trombones are added to the score for the Finale, in E major, which begins with two bars for trumpets alone, in octaves. The leading subject is indicated by violins and flutes, and afterwards given, in its perfect form and proper key, to the solo instrument. We have then some excellent development, an important episode in A minor, and an effective recapitulation of the principal themes, a brief animated Coda concluding the movement. The composer, who conducted his work, received the warmest marks of approbation at its conclusion; and the magnificent playing of Señor Sarasate was also thoroughly recognised by repeated rounds of applause, both artists being recalled to the platform. The rest of the programme consisted of Massenet's song, "Ah, depart, vision fair" ("Manon"), well sung by Mr. Maas; Mozart's Overture to "Zauberote" playing the audience out. On Thursday morning Handel's "Messiah," as usual,

On Thursday morning Handel's "Messiah," as usual, attracted a crowded audience—another proof that the large accession of new compositions, even of the highest merit, to our store of sacred works in no respect lessens the appreciation of the old ones. With such solo vocalists as those who appeared on this occasion—Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Patey, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Signor Foli—little need be said of the rendering of the Oratorio; but it must be recorded, as at least a step in the right direction, that the score of Herr Robert Franz was used on the occasion—thanks, we presume, to the influence of Herr Richter—and that a few other innovations were introduced, such as the assigning of the two airs "He shall feed His flock" and "Come unto Him" to one soprano vocalist. The choruses were admirably given throughout. "For unto us" and the "Hallelujah" produced a thrilling effect, and the steady and intelligent beat of Herr Richter was sensibly felt by band, chorus, principal singers, and, we may say, also, by the auditors.

The evening Concert commenced with Antonin Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," written, by commission, especially for the Festival, which attracted a large and thoroughly appreciative audience. The story chosen is that treated by Bürger in his ballad of "Lenora," but the tenora," but the legend varies in different countries, the version selected on this occasion being that current in the composer's native land. Karel Jaromir Erben, one of the most meritorious

Bohemian writers of the first half of this century, produced many poems, chiefly arrangements of Bohemian national legends in the popular form, and one of these is adopted as the libretto of the present work, the English translation having been made from the German of K. J. Müller. The story, as set by Dvorák, is as follows: A maiden, before a picture of the Virgin, deplores the loss of father, mother, sister, and brother, and relating her last parting with her betrothed, tells how he enjoined her to spin in the first year, bleach in the next, and make the wedding garments in the third year, when they would be wedded. The three years are over, but she is still alone, and the Maiden breathes a prayer to the Holy Mother that either her lover may be brought to her side or that she may be borne away to him. In answer to this appeal, the spectre bridegroom appears and persuades the Maiden to depart with him at once. The midnight journey, on foot, over boulders and rocks, is made more dismal by the yelling of dogs and the screech-owl. Noises are heard from caverns, and corpse-candles gleam over swamp and marsh. Perceiving that the Maiden carries a prayer-book, a chaplet, and a cross, the spectre lover compels her to give them up and a cross, in spectre over compensate to give them to him one by one, that he may hurl them away. After a weary journey of thirty miles, a churchyard is reached, and here the bride is told that she is at home. The spectre then urges her to leap the wall, and, as she hesitates, he shows her the way. Instead of following him, however, she takes to flight, and enters a "tiny house," closing the door after her. This proves to be a charnel-house; and, by the light of the moon shining through a crack in the roof, she perceives a corpse laid upon a plank. Then a knock comes at the door, and the spectre lover calls upon the dead to rise and let him in, or thrust out the living. Three times the corpse moves towards the door to obey the summons; but the prayers of the Maiden make it return to its former position. The crowing of a cock is now heard, which is repeated around, and people coming to early Mass find the Maiden, pale and trembling, in the dead-house, and garments scattered about the graves. All acquainted with Dvorák's works would doubtless expect that in the treatment of this weird subject he would again evidence that remarkable faculty of building up from the simplest materials whole movements of the deepest interest, and that his perfect command of orchestral resources would enable him to colour the varied events of his story with vivid truthfulness; but we doubt whether many were prepared for a display of such forcible dramatic power as is evidenced throughout the Cantata. Like a pencil sketch of a great painting, the pianoforte and vocal score in the hands of the audience conveys but a feeble notion of the massive effects and delicate tints of instrumentation with which this truly original artist has thrown life into every phase of the striking theme he has chosen; and the earnestness with which the auditors followed the stirring events of each scene sufficiently proved that in secular, as in sacred, works the composer can equally command the sympathies of his hearers. In no portion of this remarkable composition is an attempt made to charm the ear at the expense of the dramatic continuity of the narrative. Where melody is demanded, phrases of real musical beauty seem to grow spontaneously from the situation, and are never unduly prolonged for the sake of a tempting, but inartistic, burst of enthusiastic applause. What may be called the "Spectre" motive is given in the first eight bars of the instrumental Introduction, a wild

What may be called the "Spectre" motive is given in the first eight bars of the instrumental Introduction, a wild theme in A minor, announced by muted violins, and this is succeeded by another subject occasionally heard in the work, the two being so ingeniously woven in as to form a movement of much interest, whilst effectually preparing the audience for the exciting musical drama which follows. A Chorus in the same key, "The stroke of midnight soon will sound," is extremely graphic, the persistent detached notes, tonic and dominant, and tonic and supertonic, being a prominent figure in the accompaniment. The choral description of the picture which hangs upon the wall, in the tonic major, although simply written for the voices, derives much interest from the instrumental part, which indeed rarely assumes the character of a mere accompaniment. With a return to the minor, in sympathy with the grief of the "pallid maiden" before the picture, the Chorus concludes, the "Spectre" motive re-appearing at the end, and dying off unexpectedly on the chord of the The soprano solo which now occurs, one of the most important in the work, is full of spontaneous dramatic feeling, the recitative in which the Maiden gives vent to her grief (much heightened in effect by some exquisite orchestral details), the beautiful phrase in A flat, expressive of her love for the absent one—interrupted by the relation of her three years' task of spinning, bleaching, and weaving the wedding garments-and the return to this theme for the breathing forth of her earnest prayer that her lover may be brought to her, or that she may be carried to him, with the re-introduction of the "Spectre" motive, in the major key, at the conclusion (for the first time in triple, instead of duple rhythm) cannot be overpraised as true and unexaggerated settings of the text; the music, like the poetry, shadowing forth with much effect the super-natural character of the legend. The baritone, at first in a solo, and afterwards in combination with the choir, now relates how the picture moves, and the lamp is extinguished. The voice of the spectre lover is then heard, singing the now familiar motive in an appeal to the maiden (accompanied in quavers with the wood-wind and horns), and a duet follows, the dramatic character of which is preserved by the voices singing chiefly in detached impassioned phrases, the two parts being but rarely com-bined. The calm character of the opening solos is admirably contrasted with the agitated music which succeeds them; and the concluding portion, with some fine orchestral figures accompanying the united voices, is extremely graphic; the "Spectre" motive (played by the clarinets) in the tonic major, and again in triple rhythm, but with different accent (followed by a few chords in the major), forming a most appropriate ending to this fine movement. At this point the composer directs that there should be a short pause, which was strictly observed, the enthusiastic marks of approbation which followed the cessation of the music, however, employing a considerable portion of the time thus allowed for dramatic effect. The long chain of music which follows, illustrative of the journey of the Maiden with her spectre lover, almost defies analysis, the startling modulations, broad and massive harmonies, and gorgeous orchestral colouring descriptive of the harrowing scenes through which they pass conjuring up a mental picture which would be marred by any division into separate movements save where temporarily demanded by the text. We may point, however, to the two duets, each commencing with the words "Fair is the night" (like the one already mentioned, chiefly in dialogue), to the baritone solo, afterwards joined by the chorus, which most dramatically carries forward the relation of the fearful incidents encountered at every step, and to the calm close on the chord of C major, most aptly expressive of the sense of utter weariness. placid duet, "Now when the night so fair doth show, is in perfect contrast with the preceding almost painfully agitated music. The beautiful theme, commenced by the tenor, and harmonised with appropriate simplicity; the responses of the Maiden to her spectre guide, in which she assures him of her faith in his love; the gradually increasing intensity of the vocal phrases and orchestral accompaniments as the Spectre, tearing the cross from the Maiden's neck, throws it far away; the arrival at the church, described in a baritone solo, with chorus; the Spectre's leap over the church wall, the flight of the Maiden, with her entrance into the "tiny house," and the thrilling scene in the deadhouse, with the dance of spectres outside, form a vivid series of events, the realism of which is thoroughly attained by the composer without resorting to the introduction of instruments, such as we can call to mind as being used in a composition of similar character, to represent the rattling of skeletons' bones. A fine effect is produced by the singing by a few voices in the distance of a phrase heard in the Introduction, to the words—and this is succeeded by one of the most powerfully dramatic numbers in the work, the baritone solos with which it is interspersed giving admirable relief to the impassioned choral passages, the incidents of the knocking at the door, and the command to thrust forth the living being intensified beyond description by the alternations of the baritone solo voice with the chorus. The prayer of the Maiden, "O Virgin Mother, gracious be," has a sympathetically simple and pleading theme, harmonised and accompanied with a grace and tenderness which effectually enforce the eloquence of the words. The final number, "There crew a cock," commences with a baritone solo, on a pedal, accompanied by the bass voices in holding notes a fifth apart, the other divisions of the choir replying alternately in disjointed intervals which may be presumed to represent the notes of the herald of the morn. The solo voice, combined with chorus (the introduction of the bell suggesting the summons to early Mass), then relates the flight of the spectral crew; and how in the morning light the Maiden was discovered in the dead-house, a placid choral phrase in the tonic major, accompanied with sweeping arpeggios for the harp, breathing forth the moral of the work, "Well was it, maiden, that thy mind turned unto God," the concluding bars for the orchestra introducing once more the "Spectre" motive, and dying off with a reminiscence of a phrase in the first soprano solo.

"The body must to death be brought, And woe to him who ill has wrought."

On entering the orchestra to conduct his work, the composer was greeted with a positive hurricane of applause, and during the varied and exciting scene so graphically placed before the auditors the attention seemed never for a moment withdrawn from the music, save to express admiration at points where audible marks of approbation did not interfere with the progress of the Every detail of the complicated orchestration, and every shade of feeling in the choral portions, came out with marvellous clearness, the whole of the Maiden's perilous journey with her spectre lover being, indeed, a perfect triumph of executive power. Madame Albani's singing, especially in the prayer at the conclusion, was absolutely perfect; and Mr. Joseph Maas, as the Spectre, and Mr. Santley, as the bass Narrator, gave the utmost effect to the highly dramatic music entrusted to them. The overwhelming applause at the conclusion of the Cantata must have convinced the composer, who was twice recalled to the platform, that he has added one more to the many decisive successes by which he has achieved a well-deserved and enduring fame. In the second part of the programme another work written for the Festival was produced, Dr. Bridge's setting of Mr. Gladstone's translation of the well-known Hymn "Rock of Ages." This piece is-as might be expected from the previous works of the composer, especially his "Hymn to the Creator," performed for the first time at the Worcester Festival last year-an earnest and truly devout composition, based on simple materials, but so obviously touched with the hand of a master as to invest it with the highest degree of interest. So closely has Mr. Gladstone's excellent translation of the Hymn followed the original by Toplady, that although the music is written to the Latin words it could be sung almost as well to those of the English version.

The title "A living and dying prayer for the holiest believer in the world," which was given to the verses when they first appeared in the Gospel Magazine, for March, 1776, may be accepted as a convincing proof of the religious feeling which inspired them in the mind of their author; and that the composer has been as deeply impressed with reverence for his task the pleading nature of the themes, as well as their sympathetic treatment with the text which they illustrate, afford equally conclusive evidence. The work opens with a placid theme in A minor, on a tonic pedal, commenced with violoncellos, bassoons, and organ, and continued with the acute stringed and wind instruments. After a close upon the dominant harmony, the baritone enters with an impressive solo, the subject of which is repeated in chorus, the figure of the instrumental introduction being continued in the accompaniment with much effect. Two unison passages-the first for sopranos and tenors, and the second for altos and basses-lead to a striking choral burst in the relative major on the words "In peccata mî redunda," the full chorus, with appropriate changes of key, and snatches of the figure already referred to in the accompaniment, being succeeded, after a pause, by a baritone solo in the tonic major, which is afterwards joined with imitative passages by the chorus, the whole of this movement reflecting with much fidelity the sacred character of the words. On the words "Mortuos cum stare again on the 7th inst., commencing with "Elijah" as their jubes," a fugue is started by the basses on a well-marked subject, which after ample development (a noticeable point being the presentation of this subject by augmentation in the bass) is suddenly arrested by a supertonic chromatic harmony, which leaves the ear in suspense during a long pause. The original baritone solo then recurs in A minor, with the same figure as before in the accompaniment; and the key changing to the tonic major, the solo, united with the chorus, continues to the conclusion, which is appropriately calm and suggestive of hopeful resignation. Mr. F. King sang the solo part of this Hymn with true artistic feeling, the choir was in every respect thoroughly efficient through-out, and the Composer was called forward and most deservedly applauded at the end of the performance. An Orchestral Selection from "Tristan und Isolde" and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture were the purely instrumental pieces in this part (both of which were magnifi-cently rendered); and Madame Albani, in a solo from Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and Mr. Maas, in the Love Song from Wagner's "Die Walkure" were, as usual, highly successful.

On Friday, the last day of the Festival, Dr. Villiers Stanford's Oratorio, "The Three Holy Children," composed for the occasion, was given in the morning, and Gounod's "Mors et Vita" was repeated in the evening. Of both these performances, too late for present notice, we shall speak in our next number, and add some concluding observations upon the artistic and financial results of the

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

WHILST it is still too early to expect anything like a practical commencement of the ensuing musical season. we can now speak with a little more definiteness of the prospects and programmes of our local societies.

The Philharmonic Society, from the preliminary announcements which have been made, apparently purposes devoting a larger share of attention to choral works than hitherto, and whilst the list is not ambitious in regard to the introduction of novelties, it is, at least, imposing in the number and importance of the works, comprising, in addition to other smaller numbers, "The Messiah," "The Creation," "St. Paul," and Handel's rarely performed "Belshazzar." The massive character of some of these Oratorios demands a full and efficient chorus, and it would be a matter for regret if the Society were unable to make good the recent defections from their ranks. We have little doubt, however, that a satisfactory response will be made to the advertisements which are being issued prior to the recommencement of rehearsals on August 31. A long list of prominent vocalists have already been engaged, including, in addition to other more familiar names, Mesdames Biro de Marion, Marie de Lido, and Henschel, and Messrs. Winch, Clifford Hallé, Henry Piercy, and Henschel. Some of these artists will receive a hearty welcome to Liverpool after their somewhat lengthened absence, and in others we may look for valuable additions to our local concert platforms. The instrumentalists include Madame Norman-Néruda, Señor Sarasate, Mons. Pach-mann, and Mr. Charles Hallé. Mr. Hallé will himself again direct the Concerts of the Society, and, with the aid of his noted band, the success of the orchestral department is ensured.

Our other prominent Society-the Philharmonic Choralhas not yet shaken off the trammels in which the financial embarrassment of the past season has involved it, and the Committee are firm in their decision to place the Society on a safe and unequivocal basis before announcing any programme. It is the public to whom they must naturally look for support, and it would be a marked reflection upon the musical taste of this city if a Society which has, by its past performances, well earned the claim to be one of the first choral societies in the North of England were allowed to collapse simply for want of sufficient monetary assistance to enable it to pay its way. Such a collapse is, however, scarcely contemplated, and it is hoped that the desired Guarantee Fund, &c., will soon be acquired. In any case, the Society will start Rehearsals by glees, part-songs, &c.

probable first performance—the high name of the Society having been originally achieved by their rendering of Mendelssohn's greatest oratorio. It is also pretty certain that the Philharmonic Choral Society will assist Herr Richter in a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, to be given in the Philharmonic Hall during the month of

The scheme of Mr. Halle's series of Orchestral Concerts has not yet been announced, but these Concerts will doubtless maintain the high standard of efficiency which have marked them during past seasons.

A transitory visit from "The Mikado" has served to waken up, if only in a somewhat frivolous manner, the musical sensibilities of Liverpool, and crowded houses have greeted the first performances here of an opera which has much to commend it, not only in its sparkling libretto, but also in the artistic scoring of many of the numbers, and particularly the concerted pieces.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

As a rule our musical societies do not decide on the compositions to be studied for the following season till the month of September. I learn, however, that the Choir of St. Vincent Street United Presbyterian Church, which is under the conductorship of Mr. Hugh McNabb, have fixed on Spohr's "Last Judgment" for the principal work to be performed at their annual Concert in the spring; also that the Kilmalcolm Musical Association, which is under the charge of Mr. Paterson Cross, of Greenock, will take up Handel's "Messiah."

The Choral Union will not be in a position to announce their arrangements for the ensuing season before the beginning of September; too late, therefore, to include the particulars in this letter.

Dr. A. L. Peace gave last month two or three Recitals of organ music in the Cathedral, all being fairly well attended. It is a pity, however, that the charge for admission (one shilling) is so high. Hundreds more than the average number attending would undoubtedly avail them-selves of the opportunity of being present were the charge, say, one-half.

The death of Mr. James Allan, Conductor of the Glasgow Select Choir, is a loss to refined choral art that will be sorely felt not only in Glasgow, but far and wide. Mr. Allan was exceedingly conscientious in all he undertook. He made it a point to closely study even the very slightest composition before beginning its practice, so as to get thoroughly into the spirit and aim of the composer. His production of expression was always natural, and he wielded the bâton with marked grace and ease. Mr. Allan had only reached the comparatively early age of 43 years. He was held in the greatest respect by the public and the profession.

The Glasgow Society of Musicians will hold its first meeting for the season on the first Saturday of October. The Pen and Pencil Club, of which most of the principal local musicians are members, resumes its meetings on the second Wednesday of that month.

THE first rehearsal for Novello's Oratorio Concerts will take place at Neumeyer Hall, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, on the 16th inst., at eight o'clock. Any persons desirous of joining the choir should attend at the offices of Mr. Stedman, the Choir Secretary, No. 12, Berners Street, W., on Tuesday, the 1st inst., between the hours of three and five and seven and nine, when the Conductor, Mr. Mackenzie, will be present for a trial of voices.

A SPECIAL course of Lectures will be delivered at the City of London College, White Street, Moorfields, during Michaelmas term of the present year, by Mr. W. A. Barrett, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Vicar-Choral of St. Paul's Cathedral, on the "Historical Development of Glees and Part-songs." The course will commence with an introductory lecture on the Study of Music in relation to other arts and sciences, and the subject will be gradually traced up to the present century; each lecture being illustrated

THE prospectus of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society for the season 1885-6 announces four Concerts, at the first of which, on October 28, Gounod's new Oratorio, "Mors et Vita," will be given, the right of performing this work having been secured for Nottingham by the Committee. In order to do full justice to the composition Mr. Charles Hallé's band has been engaged; and Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Watkin Mills as principal vocalists. The work will be given under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé. On December 30 Handel's "Messiah" will be performed, with a considerably enlarged band, the solo vocalists being Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Eleanor Rees, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Brereton; Conductor, Mr. John Adoock; on January 19, 1886, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," also conducted by Mr. Adcock, with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Henry Guy, and Signor Foli as principal vocalists; and on March 16 Sir A. Sullivan's Musical Drama, "The Martyr of Antioch," with a selection from the works of Martyr of Antioch, with a selection from the works of this composer, the solo vocalists being Miss Griswold, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Tufnail. On this occasion Sir Arthur Sullivan will conduct.

AT the Annual General Meeting of the Bach Choir, under the presidency of the Right Hon. Lord Coleridge, an address signed by Her Majesty and the Princess Christian, the President, and other members was read, expressing the sincerest regret at the retirement of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt from the post of Musical Director to the Society, assuring him that whatever good the Choir had effected was solely owing to his exertions, and conveying the heart-felt thanks of the Society to Madame Lind-Goldschmidt, who had by every means in her power contributed to the welfare of the Association. Mr. Goldschmidt gracefully acknowledged the compliment thus paid to him, and congratulated the Bach Choir upon its high position amongst Musical Societies. Mr. Arthur Coleridge then spoke of the further loss sustained by Lord Coleridge's resignation of the office of President of the Choir, and it was formally announced that the President and Musical Director elected by the Committee for the coming season were the Right Hon. Lord Monteagle, K.P., and Mr. C. Villiers Stanford, Mus. Doc.

WE are glad to learn that Dr. Spark, the Borough Organist of Leeds, has so far regained his usual health and strength as to be enabled, on Tuesday, the 11th ult., to open a new organ at Christ Church, Parkgate. The instrument was built by Messrs. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield, and contains twenty-three stops and all the latest improvements, and was used on this occasion for the first time. Dr. Spark played as the opening voluntary Smart's Andante, and before the first lesson his own "Jerusalem the Golden" (varied), the concluding voluntary being Handel's "Zadok the Priest." In the evening Dr. Spark again presided at the organ, and played an extemporaneous opening voluntary, before the first lesson, and his Sonata in F at the close of the service, giving throughout great satisfaction to his highly critical audience.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society, now entering upon its fourteenth season, will recommence its practices on the first Tuesday in October, in the St. George's Church Room, Tufnell Park, N., under the conductorship of the founder, Mr. W. Henry Thomas. The works chosen for the opening rehearsals are Cowen's new Can-tata "Sleeping Beauty" and Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages," and later on in the season Dr. Stanford's work "The Three Holy Children" and either Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" or Gounod's "Mors et Vita" will be performed. The orchestra, which was formed last year, and which rendered such valuable assistance in performing Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" and other works, will also be utilised during the ensuing season.

It is with much regret that we announce the death of Mr. J. T. Willy, the violinist, which took place on the 8th ult. For many years Mr. Willy was an active and esteemed member of the profession, his services in the orchestras of the Royal Italian Opera, the Sacred Harmonic Society, and numerous others, including those at all our provincial for strings, and even a larger number of Trios, Duets, &c., Festivals, being of the highest value. In consequence of for pianoforte and strings, have been performed, and failing health, however, for some years he had retired from received with such favour as to justify their frequent public playing.

THE prospectus of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, for the season 1885-6, announces that four Concerts will be given; at the first of which, on November 2, Schubert's Mass in F and Prout's "Alfred" will be performed; at the second, on December 21, Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon"; at the third, on February 22, 1886, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; and at the fourth, on April 12, Handel's Dettingen Te Deum and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The orchestra, soloists, and choir will be on the usual scale of completeness and efficiency; and Mr. Ebenezer Prout will retain the post of Conductor, an office which he has filled for so many years with credit to himself and benefit to the Society.

THE 198th monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union took place on the 7th ult., at the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, S.W. The programme included Part-Songs and Glees by Sullivan, Horsley, Michael Watson, Martin, H. Smart, and Purcell, all of which were extremely well rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday. "Tother day as I sat". (Sir John Goss) was also well sung as a double quartet. Songs were given by Miss Susetta Fenn, Miss Kate Flinn, Mr. H. G. Ryall, Mr. Walter Joy, Mr. Charles Copland and Mr. Theodore Distin. Mr. F. R. Kinkee was the accompanist and also contributed a pianoforte solo.

THE members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 162nd monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on Friday, the 21st ult. The programme consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the solo vocalists being Mrs. Luff, Mrs. Isabel Selection, the solo yocalists being Mrs. Lun, Mrs. Isabel Browning, Mr. S., Noble, and Mr. A. Roach. The partmusic included "The Children's Hour" (Gaul), "Silent Night" (Barnby), "Gipsy Chorus" (Weber), "From Oberon" (Stevens), &c. Mrs. J. E. Smith contributed two pianoforte solos, Mr. C. H. A. Bradbury two violin solos, and Mr. T. F. Williams a concertina solo. Mr. G. R. Egerton accompanied, and Mr. Williams (in the absence of Mr. Woodhouse) conducted.

MR. FRANK MAJOR, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Saviour's, Hans Place, was recently presented by the vicar, congregation, and friends of the church, on the occasion of his marriage with Miss Jane Hogg, R.A.M., with a very handsome ormolu clock and candelabra to match, as a token of their esteem and appreciation of his services. The Rev. Dr. Strickland, in presenting the testimonial, spoke very highly of Mr. Major's musical success at St. Saviour's, during a period of seven years. The Choir afterwards gave a very chaste marble dining-room clock as a souvenir of their kind feeling.

During the eve of the Dedication Festival, at St. James's, Kennington, a very successful performance of Handel's Dettingen Te Deum was given with full orchestral accompaniment, the solos being well rendered by Mr. Reuben Holmes and Mr. Mitton, a member of the choir. The orchestra was supplied by the members of the Kennington Orchestral Club, to whom great credit is due, as also to Mr. W. H. Tozer, the Organist of the Church, who presided at the organ. The performance was under who presided at the organ. The performance was under the direction of Mr. Orbel Hinchliff, Conductor to the above-named club.

THE death of Mr. Harold Thomas, which occurred on July 29, removes from the Royal Academy of Music one of its oldest and most esteemed pianoforte professors. Mr. Thomas entered the Academy as a student at the age of fifteen, studying the pianoforte under Sterndale Bennett, whose first Pianoforte Concerto he played at a Philharmonic Concert in 1864. The deceased was also known as a composer, several of his works—especially the Overture "Mountain, Lake, and Moorland"—having been received with much favour.

WE regret that our article upon the London Musical Season, in the last number, contained no allusion to the Concerts of the Musical Artists' Society. We are reminded of this omission by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, Hon. Sec. to the Society, who tells us that during its career, extending over thirty-seven Concerts, no less than twenty-five Quartets for strings, and even a larger number of Trios, Duets, &c., repetition.

The following candidates have passed the Examinations recently held for the Diplomas of Trinity College, London:—Licentiate in Music—John M. Ennis. Associates in Music—Joseph Bates, Daniel Bradfield, Geo. T. Huxham, Thos. Robinson, Anne E. Shaw, and Chas. W. Wainwright. The Examiners were Mr. B. Agutter, Mus. B.; Mr. John Francis Barnett, Mr. A. E. Drinkwater, Ma.; Prof. Jas. Higgs, Mus. B.; Mr. W. S. Hoyte, Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus. B.; Dr. H. Keeton, Dr. C. W. Pearce, Dr. Armand Semple, and Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. B.

MR. W. REA, of Newcastle, announces a series of three Subscription Concerts to be given during the forthcoming season. The first will be orchestral, by Herr Richter's band, and will be followed by performances of "Israel in Egypt" and Gounod's Birmingham work "Mors et Vita." We hope that this interesting programme will ensure to Mr. Rea the success deserved by his spirited enterprise, and that his efforts in the cause of music in Newcastle may receive greater recognition than they have hitherto met with.

The Popular Choral and Orchestral Societies announce that the rehearsals will be resumed in October, at the Charterhouse, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Henry Thomas. These Societies did useful work last season in the poorer parts of East London, giving performances of "The Messiah," "Acis and Galatea," and Sullivan's "H.M.S. Pinafore," in Shoreditch, Whitechapel, Bermondsey and Clerkenwell, at very cheap prices, to audiences composed of the working classes.

The prospectus of the Tottenham Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Fred. S. Oram, announces that forty members have already been enrolled, and that many more are likely to join before the season commences. The practices are held at Bruce Grove Chambers, Tottenham; and it is hoped that those who may not feel disposed to become active, may become honorary, members, as the expenses of the Society will necessarily be heavy during this, its first, season.

In our May number we gave an outline of the programme of the Hereford Musical Festival, which commences on the 8th inst., and are now enabled to state that the sale of tickets is proceeding most satisfactorily, and that everything promises well for the meeting. The unusually large list of stewards is headed by the names of the Right Hon. Lord Bateman, President, and the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Hereford, Vice-President.

It is announced that the members of the Willing Choir have formed themselves into a Choral Society, under the name of the London Select Choir. A body of 300 voices will be conducted by Mr. W. G. Cusins, Master of the Music to the Queen. The Director is Mr. Sumner. The Choir will be heard for the first time at Mr. Ambrose Austin's Concerts at St. James's and the Albert Halls.

THE Crystal Palace Concerts will be resumed on October 17, ten Concerts being given before Christmas and ten between February and Easter. It is hoped that Brahms's new Symphony will be given during the season, and possibly a new Symphony by Mr. Cowen.

THE Free Concerts in Westminster Chapel, James Street, Buckingham Gate, S.W., which proved so attractive last season, will be resumed early in October. Artists from the Royal Academy of Music will be engaged, and the Concerts, as before, will be under the directorship of the Organist, Mr. H. C. Tonking.

At the recent Midsummer Higher Examination of Trinity College, London, Marianne Rea, of Liverpool, obtained the position of Associate Vocalist, scoring the maximum of marks, and Hannah Quick of Prescot, Lancashire, gained that of Certificated Pianist. Both are pupils of Mr. James J. Monk, of Liverpool.

MR. J. F. Brewer gave an Organ Recital on Sunday, the 23rd ult., at St. Helen's Church, North Kensington. The programme included selections from the works of Bach, Handel, Hesse, &c.

We understand that Mr. Dexter Smith, editor of the Boston (U.S.) Musical Record, is passing a few weeks in London before proceeding to the Continent.

REVIEWS.

Mary Magdalen. An Oratorio. Words by Henry S. Leigh. Music by J. Massenet. [J. Williams.]

THE name of Jules Massenet has become tolerably familiar to the English public, through the medium of his operas and orchestral suites; but, so far as we are aware, not one of his sacred works has been executed in this country. These are three in number, the others being "Eve," a mystery in three parts, and "La Vièrge," a sacred legend in four scenes. The present work, which is regarded as his masterpiece in this style of writing, is described in the original as a sacred drama in three acts and four parts, and we are at a loss to know on whose authority the term oratorio has been applied to it. The eminent French critic, M. Arthur Pougin, speaking of its successful production at the Odèon Theatre, Paris, in 1873, says distinctly that the composer designedly abstained from calling his work an oratorio. "M. Massenet had not adopted, and did not desire to adopt on this occasion, the broad, noble, and pompous style of oratorio. A painter and a poet, he endeavoured in this novel and tender work to give prominence to reverie and landscape; further, he has introduced the tones of a genuinely human passion, a somewhat earthly tenderness, which would have opened the door to adverse criticism if it could be supposed that he wished to follow upon the traces of Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn. To sum up, the work was beautiful, suave, impregnated with a perfume of youth and poetry, and, with this, grandiose at times, and very touching." It is therefore an injustice to M. Massenet to make his work pretend to be what it is not, and a like endeavour to meet supposed English prejudices, which we believe are practically extinct, is observable in placing the words of the Saviour in the mouth of an Evangelist. The adaptor is now dead, and we do not know how long ago he executed his part of the work, but should fancy it must have been prior to the appearance of "The Redemption," as in that work Christ is personified, and no one, so far as we are aware, has raised any protest. The plan of "Mary Magdalen" may be briefly described. The repentant sinner expresses her grief and is taunted by her former associates, Judas Iscariot adding his voice and advising her to resume her old life of dissipation. Christ arrives and speaks consoling words, the part or act coming to an end with an ensemble in the style of an operatic finale. The second act is laid at Bethany, and consists merely of solo and concerted pieces for Mary, Martha, Judas, and Christ. Then we pass at once to the crucifixion and the revilings of the mob, with which are mingled the laments of the Magdalen. The second scene of this act takes place in the garden, where the risen Jesus appears to Mary, and is worshipped by her and the disciples. It will be seen that in structure the libretto is fragmentary, and not in any sense dramatically cohesive. The music is very unequal, being most meritorious when it is least pretentious. M. Massenet possesses a vein of charming and fanciful melody, and some of the numbers are delicious in effect, though certainly wanting in the dignity which we are wont to consider necessary in sacred music. The best are the opening pastoral chorus of women, the succeeding air of Mary, the finale of the first act, a duet for fessus and Mary, and the air which the Magdalen sings at the foot of the cross. In all of these the freshness and naïveté of the music carry the listener along, and he does not inquire too narrowly as to whether the subject does not require a loftier method of treatment. The choruses are grandiose rather than grand. There is not the slightest suspicion of contrapuntal writing, and passages in unison and octaves abound. On the whole, however, "Mary Magdalen," is a remarkable work, and quite worthy of a trial by our leading choral societies.

The Voice Musically and Medically Considered. By Armand Semple, B.A., M.B., Cantab. Part 1. Musical Considerations. [Baillière, Tindall and Cox.]

YEARS ago it was said, and certainly with much truth, that if a doctor could be a vocalist, and a vocalist a doctor, important results in the true cultivation of the voice must inevitably be achieved by both. Assuredly this assertion no longer applies, for medical men of the highest eminence not only theorise upon, but practically exemplify their theories of, vocal culture; and professors of singing bring the most enlightened medical knowledge to bear upon their daily teachings. The author of the work before us says that no person can have studied music, practically, with more enthusiasm than himself; and that in his book he has set before us those facts which he has positively gained by experience. A counsellor of this kind is worth listening to, and there can be little doubt that what he has to tell us will be extensively read by all professors of vocalisation. Reserving for Part 2 his "Medical Considerations," Mr. Semple here explains the grades or qualities of the voices in each sex, and gives some easily understood rules for their management and healthy de-All his remarks upon the regulation of the velopment. compass of the several registers are extremely good; and we cordially concur in his opinion that "high or low notes will become all the stronger if the middle part of the voice is more carefully cultivated than it usually is." His observations upon the necessity of duly studying the words in every piece a vocalist undertakes to interpret before an audience are worthy of quotation:

"The singer," he says, "having acquired the production of the voice according to the best method which I have endeavoured to indicate, it remains to apply intellectuality to every branch of singing, and I am strongly of belief that every word that has to be sung should be previously committed to memory, and its articulation by the organs of speech most carefully attended to with a view of carrying this out. This can only be accomplished by reading the words at first, and finding out on which points to dwell, together with the most prominent consonants, and, in short, to make elocution the preliminary step to every vocal effort. If this is done with proper care the glaring and objectionable errors in pronunciation that are met with, particularly in amateur singers, would be altogether avoided; and it must be remembered that this precaution can be taken by every amateur, without the aid of a master, if intellectuality be applied to the vocal art." Seeing that the author of this work is a medical as well as a musical man, we are not surprised that a doctor's view of the true method of practising should creep in, even before the commencement of Part 2. "As a point," he says, "which seems to connect the musical with the medical considerations of the subject, I take this opportunity of expressing my strong sense of the healthy nature of the proper exercise and development of vocal power. This, I think, will be conceded by every physiologist who has given attention to the matter. judicious employment of the voice in singing, the lungs are steadily and firmly inflated, their elastic power fully exercised, the organs of circulation brought into vigorous action, the muscular power of the chest increased, weakness strengthened, and the digestive organs undoubtedly stimulated." We are glad to record this medical testimony as to the physical effects of singing. Undue or unnatural exercise of any part of the body will, of course, produce ill consequences; but that constant use of the vocal organs, under intelligent control, is conducive to health is sufficiently proved by the long lives of our celebrated orators, singers, and actors.

Musikalische Skizzen und Studien. Ein Beitrag zur Kultur und Musik-Geschichte. Von August Wellmer. [Hildburghausen: F. W. Gadow und Sohn.]

THE chief interest attaching to this little volume of musical sketches and studies lies in the independent thought bestowed by the author upon his varied subjects, and in the perfect frankness and even naïveté with which he gives it utterance. These are merits which it is the privilege of the reviewer to gladly recognise wherever he meets with them, be the writer's expressed views those of the professed musician, or as seems more probable in the present instance, of the well-informed dilettante. Musical history, past and present, offers a vast and, as yet, but partially cultivated field, for the exploration of which the earnest researches of the amateur are as much needed as are those of the professed expert of the subject. Among the essays which appear to us most worthy of attention in the present collection may be instanced that on Karl Löwe, the musical interpreter par excellence of the to colour the whole composition.

German "Ballade," and the meritorious composer of what is termed the "secular oratorio," a musician whose genius is being more and more appreciated amongst his countrymen in these latter days. With the above category may likewise be classed the two articles on Anton Rubinstein, and his conception of the sacred opera-drama or drame religieux, the realisation of which constitutes the chief aim of that remarkable artist's creative activity in the present day. The collection also includes thoughtfully written articles on "The Relations of Poetry to Music," "The development of Lied, Ballade, and Legende in the nine-teenth century," "The Sacred Oratorios, from Bach to the present epoch," as well as papers on "Luther's influence upon Music," and on "Robert Franz." Those specially interested in the subjects suggested by the above headings will find it quite worth their while to peruse the respective pages devoted to their elucidation by Herr Wellmer.

Nehemiah. An Oratorio. Composed by Horace Hill. [Joseph Williams.]

In the introduction of this work it is said that the story of Nehemiah has never before been taken as a theme for musical treatment. This is incorrect, as an oratorio on this subject, by Mr. Josiah Booth, was published only a few months ago. The error is not important, but the fact of the two works being issued within so short a time of each other is a singular coincidence. The present composer is a Mus. Doc. of Cambridge, which is equal to saying that he is a good musician. He also proved himself a capable choir-trainer last year at the Norwich Festival. The words of his oratorio are taken exclusively from Holy Writ, and the incidents are those which are narrated in the first six chapters of the Book of Nehemiah. In his music Dr. Hill shows himself strongly conservative, the treatment being throughout lyrical rather than dramatic. At the same time, there is no objectionable stiffness or formality in the structure of the various solo and concerted numbers. Modern feeling is frequently apparent, perhaps the most conspicuous being in the Duet in which the Samaritans, Sanballat and Tobiah, ridicule the Jews for attempting to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. As will be anticipated, there is some excellent fugal writing in the choruses. With these general remarks we shall be content for the present, as an opportunity of hearing "Nehemiah" will probably occur during the coming winter.

Two Sketches for the Pianoforte. Composed by G. W. F. Crowther. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE thoughtful and artistic writing of Mr. Crowther displayed in these two unambitious sketches should not be passed over with a mere conventional word of praise. It is evident that the composer has been trained in a good school; and every encouragement should be offered to one who, in his early appeals to the public, shows an earnest desire to influence, rather than be influenced by, the taste of the day. No. 1, "Rondino-Scherzando in F," whilst sufficiently melodious to attract young pianists, is written on a purely classical model, and contains some excellent practice for part-playing. No. 2, "Novellette in C," is an impetuous Allegro, and although scarcely perhaps equal to No. 1, shows unmistakable signs of good musicianship throughout. The changes of key are extremely happy, and the piece does much credit to the composer.

Golden Grain. Song. Words by Mrs. Gordon. Music by C. A. Macirone. [Stanley Lucas, Weber & Co.]

It is rarely indeed that we discover such "golden grain" as this amongst the heaps of seed with which our garner is overstocked; but when we do, it is but fair to lose no time in conveying a knowledge of the fact to our readers. Miss Macirone has really given us a charming song, which will sufficiently recommend itself if vocalists will only heed our advice to make themselves acquainted with its merits. Apart from the melodious attraction of the song, the harmonies cling so exquisitely around the vocal theme as to compel the most perfect sympathy between singer and pianist for its due rendering. We do not often call attention to the technical names of the chords used by composers, but that known as the "chord of the thirteenth" (which, by the way, seems rapidly growing into favour) seems so lovingly dwelt upon throughout that it may almost be said The Organist's Album. A Series of Original Compositions and Arrangements. By Josef Trousselle.
[Marriott and Williams.]

TWELVE numbers of this publication are before us, four of which are original pieces by the editor. The best of these are No. 2, a smoothly written and melodious Romance in D, and No. 10, a "Schlummerlied." It is impossible to say very much in favour of the arrangements, either as regards the selection of the pieces or the manner in which the task of transcription has been carried out. For example, in No. 3, the March from "Fidelio," the player is directed to use the full organ, including a 16-feet trombone, and in No. 8, the Bridal March from "Lohengrin," the symphony before the return of the principal theme is again marked full organ! Even worse is the caricature of the Minuet from Mozart's E flat Symphony (No. 11). No. 4. the Largo from Beethoven's Sonata in D, Op. 2; and No. 6, the "Evening Star" song from Tannhäuser are much better. The curious want of judgment in some of the stop directions, and the numerous typographical errors are evidence of editorial carelessness.

Songs in a Corn Field. A Cantata for female voices, and accompaniment for pianoforte (with harmonium and harp ad libitum). The poetry written by Christina Rossetti. The music composed by G. A. Macfarren. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This melodious little Pastoral Cantata was produced at the Concerts of Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir in 1869 with decisive success. The characteristic song "There goes the swallow," sung by Madame Dolby, and the declamatory solo " Deeper than the hail can smite," by Madame Bodda-Pyne, were received with warm applause, the former being re-demanded. Since then—with the exception of the contralto song first-named, which has been a favourite both in public and private—the work seems to have been confined to drawing-room use, and we have often wondered why it was not put forward in an edition appealing to Choral Societies. Now that it has come into the possession of Messrs. Novello, as might be expected, this has been done without loss of time; and we have very little doubt that the knowledge of the very many beauties contained in the Cantata will rapidly be spread far and wide, for we can say with confidence that no more attractive composition, exclusively for female voices, exists.

Original Organ Compositions. By George F. Vincent. [W. J. Willcocks and Co.]

This volume contains eleven pieces, ranging from a Grand Offertoire in F to short Preludes and Interludes. We do not remember to have seen any of the composer's previous efforts, but as this is his Opus 19 he is probably a musician of some experience. In the present instance he has been more successful in trifles than in pieces of "longue haleine." His Offertoire is based on two themes, which recur again and again in various keys, but there is no regular development and the bravura writing is un-meaning and puerile. A so-called "Chœur" in F, and a "March Triumphant" in D (why not Triumphant March?) are also patchy and vague, but some of the smaller pieces, notably a Minuet and Trio in G, and a Meditation in A flat, are extremely pleasing. Mr. Vincent certainly possesses the gift of melody, though he does not invariably turn it to the best account.

Original Hymn-tunes. By H. J. E. Holmes. Arranged by John E. Gaul. [Conrad Herzog and Co.]

WE are left in doubt as to the respective shares of the composer and editor in these tunes as they at present appear; but as the former is an amateur we presume the task of the latter has been to correct the harmonies and generally to make the rough places plain. If so, he has scarcely succeeded, for grammatical errors, such as consecutive fifths and unresolved discords, abound. The composer has some feeling for melody, although it frequently takes a flippant and secular turn, and therefore becomes displeasing to those who prefer dignity of style in church music. A few of the fifty-two tunes in this book are unexceptionable in every sense, but as a whole they cannot be commended.

Sing-Song. Twenty-seven Rhymes. Selected from the Volume by Christina Rossetti. Set to music by Mary Carmichael. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

CERTAINLY children cannot complain that their traditional ditties are unheeded by composers; for not only as solos. but as part-songs they are placed before juvenile and adult vocalists in a most attractive form, and even the stories of our youthful days are now often seized upon as subjects for Cantatas. The composer of these "Rhymes," although devoting her talents to the task of adding to the store of nursery musical libraries, has ignored the conventional legends, and taken some excellent words by Christina Rossetti, which we are certain will delight all the little listeners who care to admit a modern poet into their ideal world. Many of the lines are indeed admirable: and in most cases the quaint simplicity of the author has been treated most sympathetically in the musical setting. But we cannot conscientiously say that the compositions are of equal merit, nor indeed that they are free from absolute fault; as, for example, where in No. 1, between the nineteenth and twentieth bar, the melody moves up in fifths with the bass. Some of the pieces, however, will no doubt with the bass. Some of the pieces, nowever, will no double become favourities, especially No. 3, "Mix a pancake"; No. 5, "Wrens and Robins"; No. 8, "Shake the Cherry Tree"; No. 11, "Who has seen the Wind"; No. 16, "Fly away, fly away"; No. 21, "If I were a Queen"; No. 22, "Eight o'clock, the Postman's Knock"; and No. 27, "Dancing on the Hill-top," The accompaniments to all these songs are, as they should be, adapted for small hands, and there are no chords to frighten the young

The Dirge of Darthula. Part-song for six voices. The words from Ossian.

The Serenade. Part-song for six voices. The English version by J. Powell Metcalfe.

Vineta. Part-song for six voices. The English version by J. Powell Metcalfe. Composed by J. Brahms.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

For the first time, these three part-songs appear published with English words, and so excellently do they sympathise with Brahms's beautiful music that we doubt whether the most critical listener could detect that the text was not that which the composer originally set. Published in the Second Series of "Novello's Part-Song Book" the circulation of these already favourite compositions, in the vernacular, must be enormously increased; for works to ensure a cordial reception amongst the people should be "understanded of the people"; and we hope to see many other vocal pieces of this character issued with an English translation, especially when they can be entrusted to such competent hands.

I was glad. Festival Anthem. By John Storer, Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

This anthem was composed for a recent festival at the parish church, Scarborough, of which Mr. Storer is organist. He is evidently a musician of considerable talent, his ideas being far from common-place. The anthem consists of a boldly written chorus, in which free use is made of chromatic harmonies; an extremely melodious soprano solo and male chorus, and a brief concluding chorus with a fugato. The composer is a little too fond of sudden transitions of key, The and another defect is the endless repetitions of words. The sentence "I was glad" is repeated sixteen times in the first chorus. We draw attention to these points because Mr. Storer shows more than ordinary promise.

Flowers. A Cantata for female voices. Written by Edward Oxenford. Composed by J. L. Hatton. [Forsyth Brothers.]

A PARTY of maidens seeking shelter from the noonday sun, while away the time by singing the praises of the various flowers they have met with in their rambles. Nothing can be simpler than this theme; but it gives rise to some highly poetical lines by Mr. Oxenford, and some charmingly melodious music by Mr. Hatton. Two solos, two duets, two choruses, and a trio complete the work, which amateurs will, we are certain, thank us for bringing to their notice.

Twelve Schubert's Songs. With simplified Pianoforte accompaniments, and arranged within a moderate compass to suit all singers. By Ruben Rogier. English translation of words by Oliver Brand. [Frederick Pitman.]

ALTHOUGH we are always anxious that good musical works should be circulated in cheap form amongst the people, we by no means agree with the system of publishing altered and transposed editions of well-known vocal pieces, arranged so as "to suit all singers," not only because the intentions of composers are thus obscured, but because the theorem of the property of the summer of

They that go down to the sea. Motett. By Harvey Löhr. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE have had occasion from time to time to notice Mr. Löhr's compositions in favourable terms, but the work before us far surpasses all his previous efforts with which we are acquainted. In terming it a Motett rather than an anthem the composer was probably influenced by its length and elaboration and the fact of its being scored for orchestra. The organ accompaniment, however, would be very effective in the hands of a skilful player. The Motett opens in a flowing yet dignified manner, but at the words "For at His word the stormy wind ariseth" the writing becomes agitated and picturesque, and this part of the movement is worked out at considerable length. A fine and highly original passage, "Their soul melteth away," leads to the resumption of the original theme, and shortly afterwards this admirable chorus is brought to a peaceful close. The next section is an extremely expressive and well-developed soprano solo, "So when they cry unto the Lord," which leads without pause into the vigorous and broadly planned final chorus, "O that men would therefore praise the Lord." Mr. Löhr's work may be strongly recommended to the notice of choral societies and the conductors of church festivals.

In ye Olden Time. Menuet de la Cour; for the Pianoforte. By Cotsford Dick. [Weekes and Co.]

No doubt the day will arrive when pianoforte pieces must stand or fall by their own merit alone; but at present the rage for modern antiques presents such facilities to composers of but small inventive powers that a very commonplace work will often receive undue notice merely because it "sounds old." Mr. Cotsford Dick is one of the most prolific producers of this class of music; and being able to write very simple and very melodious phrases, is also assuredly one of the most popular. But we cannot conscientiously award him higher praise than is warranted by the worth of the composition before us merely because he calls it "In ye Olden Time." Indeed, if he had left it without a title, we much doubt whether it would have made its way through the crowd; and this, although a severe test, is after all the true one. Let us say, however, that we have seen some very good music by this composer, and shall be glad to welcome him in a piece the title page of which is in the language of the day.

Singing in Schools. A complete Course of Practical Teaching. By Alfred B. Haskins. [Bemrose and Sons.]

The author of this work brings much practical experience to bear upon the subject he professes to treat; and so far as we can judge from a perusal of his book, pupil teachers preparing students for a Government Examination may, we think, rely upon good results by rigidly following the course laid down. We quite agree with Mr. Haskins's recommendation not to attempt any "short cuts" in order to arrive more rapidly at the desired end. There is too much of this in the present day, the bad effects of which, although thoroughly known to competent professors, are unfortunately hidden from pupils.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Second Series, Nos. 516-521. | Novello, Ewer and Co. |

In this series of six part-songs, reprinted from "The Choristers' Album," we have some charming compositions, of which conductors of choral societies will be glad to make the acquaintance. A word or two with reference to each number must suffice. "Sweet evening hour," by Samuel Reay, is in that elegant composer's best style, the freedom of the part-writing entitling it almost to madrigalian dignity. Pinsuti's "Fair land we greet thee" will appeal forcibly to Welsh choristers. It has an effective piano accompaniment, and a favourite Cambrian air is introduced, first as a tenor and then as a soprano solo. "Rise fair goddess," by Henry Smart, and "A garland for our fairest," and "Around the maypole," by J. L. Hatton, are simpler, but full of pleasing melody. The last-named is a dainty and piquant little composition. Schira's "The boat-anan's good-night" is a charming part-song, the last few bars of which are sufficiently taking to ensure its popularity.

Te Deum and Jubilate in G. By E. H. Thorne. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This setting of the morning canticles is somewhat remarkable as regards the arrangement of the voice parts. The Te Deum opens in six parts (two sopranos and two tenors), but from the sixth verse to the end only four voices are employed. The Jubilate, on the other hand, opens in four, but the Gloria Patria is in six (two altos and two basses); virtually, therefore, it is a service for an eight-part choir, which may militate against its general acceptance. But the music is not difficult, and it is bright and vigorous, without being flippant or unchurchlike.

Make a joyful noise. By A. C. Mackenzie. (Octavo Anthems, No. 290.) [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MUSICIANS will not need to be informed that this is the magnificent chorus from "The Rose of Sharon," in which Mr. Mackenzie has exhibited his complete grasp of the Church style of composition. As an anthem it will no doubt be often performed wherever there is a choir capable of rendering it justice.

Blessed are the pure in heart. Anthem for three Female Voices. Composed by Ernest Lake.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Anthem—published in "Novello's Octavo Edition of Trios, &c., for Female Voices"—may be recommended as an excellent composition for the use of choirs not desiring to attack more abstruse works. Written especially for the "Girls' Friendly Society," it aims at producing good effects by simple means, and we can conscientiously affirm that this aim is thoroughly accomplished. The Anthem is also issued without accompaniment.

Love, art thou true? Song. Words by Beatrice Goldingham. Music by Alfred J. Caldicott. [Alfred Hays.]

An expressive and well-written song, with just such unobtrusive harmonies as sympathise with the feeling of the composition. The change from C to 6-8 time gives much tender emphasis to the appealing words of the title, which is aided by the alteration in the character of the accompaniment. Although simple in the extreme, this is genuine music throughout.

The Marionettes' Ball. A Sketch for the Pianoforte. By J. C. Beazley. [Wood and Co.]

Although obviously suggested by Gounod's popular "Funeral March of a Marionette," Mr. Beazley's Sketch is entitled to attention on its own merits. The quaint opening in E minor, and the following theme in the tonic major, fairly reflect the intention of the composer; and though we might wish for a little more variety, as a mere pianoforte trifle we are bound to give it a good word.

The Guitar. Impromptu for the Pianoforte. By Carl Bohm. [Edwin Ashdown.]

It is difficult, indeed, for the composer of this Impromptu to steer clear of the characteristic phrases in Ferdinand Hiller's well-known sketch, "Zur Guitarre." That he has effectually overcome this difficulty, however, and also written a clever little piece, we admit; but why should he choose a subject already well treated by an eminent man?

FOREIGN NOTES.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN is again concentrating his creative faculties upon the composition of a Biblical Drama, entitled "Moses." In a recent letter, the pianist-composer refers to his new undertaking as follows: "The work, which will require four hours in its execution, is too theatrical in its motives for a concert, and too much of the oratorio measure for the stage. It is, therefore, the complete type of the opéra religieux that I have dreamt about for many What may happen to me or my labours, I years past. know not, but I can scarcely trust that the representation of 'Moses' can be carried through in a single performance; and this remains but a hope for the publisher. As the composition includes eight distinct series, it may be possible to perform one or two selections at a time, either in the concert-room or on the stage." The writer adds that there is no prospect of his work being ready for complete representation before September, 1886. Those who, like ourselves, have witnessed the first performance, at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, some two years ago, of Rubinstein's Biblical drama "Sulamith," will doubtless follow with much interest the development of the composer's ideas regarding the opéra religieux, which that work already foreshadows.

The performance every Saturday afternoon of one or two motetts by the choir of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, is, as every musician knows, a time-honoured institution of the origin of which, however, but little seems to have been known hitherto. According to a recently discovered document in the municipal archives of Leipzig, it appears that on September 14, 1358, the convent of St. Thomas met in council, and with a view to averting the wrath of the Deity, as manifested in the plague then raging in those parts, made a solemn vow that henceforth a special service should be held every Saturday at St. Thomas's Church. That vow was religiously kept, the custom, with some modifications, having outlived the Reformation, and is

Ferdinand Hiller's highly interesting collection of autographs has been bequeathed, by the late composer, to the Municipal Library of Cologne, "in token of his sincere attachment to the town which had become a second home to him." A vast quantity of letters received by Hiller during his long life (carefully selected, and bound in some thirty volumes) will, most likely, also become the property of the Cologne Library, but their contents are to be made use of for purposes of publicity only after the lapse of twenty-five years. They will, doubtless, furnish some valuable material to the music-historian of the most important phases in the development of the art during the present century.

The hundredth anniversary of the birth of the late Friedrich Wieck, the father and principal musical instructor of Clara Schumann, was commemorated by an appropriate musical performance, on the 18th ult., at Dresden, where for many years he occupied a leading position as a professor of the art. Wieck, who was also a composer of merit, died in 1873, at the mature age of eighty-eight.

According to the lately-published statistical report of the Berlin Opera, there were 249 operatic performances, from August 1884 to June 1885, at this establishment, the répertoire comprising fifty-five different works, representing twenty-six composers. The only novelties produced during the operatic year were Herr Frank's "Nero," and Victor Nessler's "Der Trompeter von Säkkingen."

Herr Albert Niemann, the redoubtable German tenor, will again commence his annual series of representations at the Berlin Opera during the coming winter, beginning with the youthful part of Walther von Stolzing in Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." This truly great artist is now in his fifty-fifth year.

Max Bruch's new oratorio "Achilles," the success of which at the recent Bonn Festival we recorded in our last number, has already been accepted for performance at six of the leading towns of Germany.

The Hof-Theater now in course of erection at Schwerin will be pre-eminent in the Fatherland as regards immunity from the danger of a conflagration similar to that by which its predecessor was destroyed. It is being constructed in all its parts of iron and stone exclusively, and will be completed in the course of next year.

Herr Göpfart, music-director of Mannheim, has completed an opera, entitled "Quintin Messis," dealing with the fortunes of the historical artist-locksmith of Antwerp known by that name. The new work of the as yet little known composer is spoken of very highly by competent judges, amongst them by no less an authority than Franz Liszt himself

Miss (or, as she prefers to call herself, "Signora") Ella Russel, the young American singer, achieved a great success at her débût last month in the character of Violetta in "Traviata," at the Kroll'sche Theatre of Berlin.

This year's Music Festival at Bonn has realised a surplus of 1,353 marks, which sum has been handed over to the trustees of the Robert Schumann Institution of that town. Madame Christine Nilsson will give a series of Concerts in the leading towns of Germany during the coming winter, commencing next month with Berlin.

Schubert's music to his opera "Rosamunde," the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung states, is to be revived at the Magdeburg Stadt-Theater in connection with a performance of Shakespeare's "As you like it," the original text of the opera by Helmine von Chezy having proved fatal to the success of the work.

At the Royal Opera House at Stuttgart the lowering out of sight of the orchestra, according to the Bayreuth model, has been adopted, and will be a fait accompli before the recommencement of performances.

Madame Pauline Lucca, it is stated in German papers, has accepted an engagement at the Berlin opera, where she will give a series of performances during the last three months of the present year.

Hector Berlioz's Opera "Benvenuto Cellini" is to be produced shortly at the Carlsruhe Hoftheater. This interesting work of the great French composer was performed for the first (and only) time in Germany some years since, at Hanover, under the auspices of Dr. Hans von Bülow.

Eugen d'Albert, the pianist-composer, has just completed the composition of a Symphony.

At the Paris Grand Opéra, the production of the following new works is contemplated during the coming season, viz., M. Massenet's "Cid," M. Paladilhe's "La Patrie," and M. Salvayre's "La Dame de Montsoreau." During three months, commencing from January next, performances of Italian Opera will be given here three times a week, with Madame Adelina Patti as leading "star." new ballet, with choruses, entitled "Loreley," by M. Ambroise Thomas, will also be produced during the season. At the Opéra Comique, the much talked of first performance of "Lohengrin" will be the greatest venture of the new campaign, around which much controversial interest will naturally cluster. M. Talazac will interpret the title-rôle, and Mdlle. Calvé that of Elsa. It may be added, however, that the opinion gains ground in some quarters that the projected "Lohengrin" performances will be abandoned at the last moment by the management. M. Salvayre's "Egmont" will probably be brought out by the same institution during the season.

The excellent Paris Society for Historical Research has just offered a substantial prize for a "History of Dramatic Music in France," from the beginning of the seventeenth century to the year 1870. Here is an instance (which could be easily multiplied) of the encouragement offered to aspiring students of the art, not only in France but elsewhere on the Continent, which might be imitated with advantage by similar institutions in this country.

The Paris Academy of Fine Arts has awarded the first prize (3,000 francs) of a recent competition to M. Julien Tiersot for an essay on "Les Melodies populaires et la chanson en France, depuis le commencement du seizième siècle jusqu'à la fin du dix-huitième."

It is stated in continental journals that Herr Hermann Franke has made the preliminary arrangements for a short series of Wagner Concerts, to be given in the French capital in February next year. Herr Hans Richter is to be the Conductor.

The Athenæum says: "The statement that one of the principal singing prizes at the Paris Conservatoire has been awarded to a young English student is erroneous. Miss Moore, the recipient in question, is a native of Massachusetts."

No less than nine new operettas of the well-known semiburlesque type are in course of preparation for the coming season at the Austrian capital, their respective composers being Herren Strauss, Millöcker, Czibulka, Roth, Suppé, Baier, Müller, jun., Helmesberger, jun., and Kremser. The fact may furnish a criterion of the prevailing taste in matters musical among the easy-going Viennese general public, which has probably but little changed since the days when Mozart wrote for them his "Cosi fan tutte." Only there is no Mozart now amongst them to humour their fancies with a frivolous libretto, and at the same time to elevate his subject by the undying strains of heaveninspired music.

A committee is being formed at Vienna for the purpose of founding what is termed a "Beethoven Museum" what analogous to the "Mozarteum" at Salzburg) at that capital. Numerous offers of Beethoviana have already been made by their possessors to the promoters of this

The projected International Congress of Musicians, which was to be held last month at Antwerp, has been postponed until the 8th inst.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, will be re-opened on the first inst., under its new régime, with a performance of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine."

M. Peter Benoit, the well-known Belgian composer, has written a "Kinder-Cantate" (Children's Cantata), which was most successfully performed last month by some 1,200 youthful executants of both sexes at the Cirque Royal, of Brussels.

The répertoire of the San Carlo Theatre, of Naples, during next season, will comprise the following Operas-viz.,

Verdi's "Aïda," Boïto's "Mefistofele," Mercadante's "La Vestale," and Miceli's "La figlia di Jefte."

We learn from Italian papers that Verdi was recently visited by Arrigo Boïto, who found the Maëstro busily engaged upon his new opera "Jago," which, it is thought, will be brought out during next year, at Milan.

Mr. Walter Damrosch, of the New York German Opera, who recently visited Germany, completed the engagements of principal singers for that institution during the coming season, among whom may be named Mesdames Marianne Brandt, and Lilli Lehmann, Herren Fischer (of Dresden), Robinson, and Kaufmann. The projected performances will include "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Walküre" nauser, "Lonengrin, "Die Meistersinger, "Walkure and "Götterdämmerung" (Wagner); "Carmen" (Bizet), "Aïda" (Verdi), "Fidelio" (Beethoven), "Le Prophète," "Les Huguenots," "L' Africaine" (Meyerbeer), "Oberon" (Weber), and other prominent operatic works. An ambitious programme, to be sure! Herren Walter Damrosch and Seidl will be the orchestral Conductors.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-It is to be hoped that the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will estimate the remarks of "H.M.S." and "Exam." at their proper worth. Unfortunately there always have been persons who, through some reason or other, finding a degree out of their reach, will not fail to depreciate its value. We are aware that in arts and science, as well as in music, no syllabus is considered perfect. Grumblers are constantly met with who freely suggest alterations which, we presume, would better suit their own particular cases and ideas. The Senates of our Universities have surely taken every care in drawing up the requirements for degrees, and would probably not be unwilling to make any alterations which would lead to ultimate good. Hence, to what end can the remarks of "H.M.S." and "Exam." serve except to lead to almost endless dispute?

"Exam," infers, near the close of his letter, that Messrs. Sullivan, Mackenzie, Stanford, Cowen, &c., have not taken degrees because degrees are of no standing. He produces no authority for this, and we must therefore account for it by inferring, on our part, that it suits "Exam." to think so. Let us ask, however, why so many other leading musicians have toiled for university degrees if such degrees are of "no standing"? We may add, in conclusion, that one cannot read the remarks of "H.M.S." and "Exam." without being, to some extent, reminded of the fox in Æsop's fable, "The Fox and the Grapes."

Yours respectfully, Mus. BAc. (Cantab.).

THE BRISTOL MADRIGAL SOCIETY. TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Will you please let me say a few words in reference to the singing of the Bristol Madrigal Society, at the Albert Hall, on July 8. Out of the 125 voices who took part in the Concert, the boys (forty-seven), were all Bristol boys; the tenors (thirty), were all Bristol tenors; the basses (twenty-nine), had Mr. A. Thomas, of Gloucester, to join with twenty-eight Bristol men. Of the altos (nineteen).

fourteen were Bristol men. When I took the bâton in 1865, out of ninety-two singers at the "Ladies' Night," thirty-three (one-third), were out-siders; and this simply because at that time there were not sufficient trained voices in Bristol to make the choir large enough to sing in the Victoria Rooms; but music in Bristol has been developed, and my own connection with the Festival Society, as its Chorus Master, has brought me for the last eight years into constant contact with 380 singers, all Bristolians; from these the Madrigal Society has been enabled to obtain what help was needed, so that as far as was possible the singers at the Albert Hall were Bristolians.-I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

D. W. ROOTHAM,

THE DOMINANT SEVENTH. TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-May I be permitted to point out the inaccuracy of a statement relating to the chord of the dominant seventh often made by theoretical writers, and repeated by Mr. Goddard in The Musical Times for August?

Mr. Goddard says :- " The great characteristic of this chord is, it is the only chord which, by itself, proclaims the key it is in; this it does in virtue of containing two notes of the scale, the fourth and seventh, the simultaneous presence of which is only compatible with one scale." This explanation is not correct: the fourth and seventh of any major scale are identical with the sixth and second of its relative minor; therefore, the presence of these notes is compatible with two perfectly distinct scales. The chord of the dominant seventh does, indeed, determine the key; but it does so because it contains the three notes of the scale-namely, the fourth, fifth, and seventh-which are characteristic of the key.—Faithfully yours,
ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

Castle Street, Sligo, August 4, 1885.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Mr. Joseph Bennett, in his article on Sebastian Bach in your last number, seems to conclude that these masters never met. I had indulged a hope that a meeting did take place; founded upon the following anecdote, transcribed from Rees's Cyclopædia, 1819; article, Sebastian Bach:—

"Old Kirkman, the Harpsichord Maker, used to relate the extraordinary curiosity excited at Saltzburg, when Handel and Sebastian Bach happened to meet in that city. On their going together to the Cathedral, they found it so full, they could scarcely get to the Organ Loft; and when one of them opened the Organ, it was not possible for more persons to crowd into the Church. But so great was the fame of these performers, that those who could not gain admission into the interior of the building, procured ladders, and placed them at the windows in order to gratify their ears with all the passages which the full organ could convey to them through all impediments."

The publication of this may, perhaps, lead to an examination of the fact, or draw information from other quarters upon an event so interesting to the lovers of music.

Yours, &c., Liverpool, August 7, 1885.

INO. DENISON JEE.

HEINRICH SCHÜTZ.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In an article on Heinrich Schütz, published in The Musical Times for December last, Mr. W. H. Cummings makes a statement which I find repeated in the notice of the recent Concert of the London Musical Society contained in the current number of THE MUSICAL TIMESthat no mention of Schütz is to be found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians." This is incorrect, for although the name does not occur in its proper position alphabetically, a fairly full notice, of some two columns length, is inserted at the end of letter S. See Vol. IV., page 45.-I am, yours obediently,

J. W. BROOKES.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

⁴y* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed no obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANAGHER, IRELAND.—On Saturday, the 8th ult., Mr. David Beardwell, A.R.A.M., gave an Organ Recital in Banagher Church. The programme comprised compositions by Handel, Bach, Mendelssohn, Gounod, Smart, Batiste, &c., and was much appreciated by the

BARTON-UNDER-NEEDWOOD.—On July 29 a new Organ, which has been presented to St. James's Church by Mr. J. C. Grinling, was dedicated by the Right Rev. Bishop Abraham. The service was full choral, and the capabilities of the new instrument were admirably brought out by Mr. E. H. Turpin, who also gave a Recital on the following day. The organ was built by Mr. Alfred Kirkland, of London and Walenday.

BERR.—The third of a series of Organ Recitals was given on the 13th ult., by Mr. W. E. Ellen, A.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church, Chard, on the new instrument recently erected in St. Michael's Church, by Messrs. Hill. The programme included selections from the works Mr. J. R. Openshaw, of Bury. A number of selections, including one of Spohr, Mendelssohn, Bach, Chopin, Handel, &c. The vocalist was Master Frank Derrick, whose voice was heard to great advantage in Gounod's "The King of Love," and Farmer's "The Son of God goes forth."

BELFAST.—Musical Services in connection with the inauguration of a large peal of bells at St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church, were held on the 9th ult. At the morning service the music for the High Mass was Gounod's Messes Soleanelic de Pâques, which was rendered in its entirety. Romberg's "Te Deum" was performed during the collection, the fugue at the close being given with especial clearness and effect. At the offertory a solo, "Ave Maria," the composition of Mr. P. Mulholland, was well sung by Mrs. H. K. Maguire. Solemn Pontifical Vespers were chanted at the evening service, the choir numbering seventy boys, carefully trained by the organist of the church, Mr. P. J. Haydon Mulholland. In the course of each service Mr. Mulholland gave a Kecital on the fine organ. During the day a handsome ivory bâton, mounted in gold, accompanied with an address on the part of the members of the choir, was presented to Mr. Mulholland by Mr. Carson, chairman of the Testimonial Committee.

BLACKPOOL—Mr. Sims Reeves attracted an immense audience to the Winter Gardens Pavilion, on the 10th ult, when he sang (including encores) five of his best known and most popular songs, including "Tom Bowling," "The Bay of Biscay," &c. Miss Bessie Holt (in the absence of Miss Alice Barth) gave several songs with much success, and was heartily applauded, and Mr. Joseph Pierpoint also woo acceptance in the solos allotted to him. The band, under M. Riviere, was satisfactory, and the accompanists were Madame Frost (piano and heart) and Mr. Myunders. satisfactory, and the accharp) and Mr. Maunders.

harp) and Mr. Maunders.

Briddengerii — The organ in St. Leonard's Church, built in 1867 by Walker and Sons, has just been completed by the addition of a choir organ and a pedal if-di. reed. The opening service, full choral, took place on July 30, the Organist, Mr. J. Sewell, presiding. The Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., who preached the sermon, expressed his high approval and admiration of the instrument. In the evening a Recital was given by Mr. William Sewell, A.R.A.M., Organist of Christ Church, Clapham, a native of the parish, and a son of the local Organist. The following was the programme:—"Marche Heroique" (Schubert), Prelude and Fugue in G (Mendelssohn), air, "Waft her, Angels" (Handel), Grand Solemn March in E flat (Smart), Andante in G (Batiste), Faniare (Lemmens), Pastorale and Gavotte Française (Scotson Clark), March (Wely).

BRIGHTON.—An interesting Lecture on "Sussex Songs and Music," was delivered by Mr. F. E. Sawyer, F. S.A., before the British Archæological Association, on the 21st ult. The Lecture was illustrated by numerous specimens of old Sussex Songs capitally rendered by Messra. Albery, Cowley, Crook, and Trist, and a small choir of boys, Mr. Neall presiding at the piano.

Mr. Near pressuing at the pisator.

CAVAK,—On July 23 the sixth annual Festival of the Kilmore Diocesan Choir Union was held in the Parish Church. Thirteen choirs took part in the service, and the admirable rendering of the music throughout bore ample proof of the careful training they had received from the inspector of the choirs, Mr. J. W. Dry. The anthem was "O give thanks" (Elvey). The sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas J. Weiland, Rector of St. Thomas, Belfast. Mr. Dry presided at the organ.

CHELMSFORD.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. F. R. Frye, F.C.O., at St. Mary's Church, on Wednesday, the zeth ult. The programme, which was well selected, was excellently rendered, and thoroughly appreciated by a large congregation.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. Henry Baillie, Organist and Choirmaster of All Souls' Church, gave his second Organ Recital for this season, in the above building, on Wednesday, the 5th ult. The following programme was thoroughly appreciated by a large congregation:—Soprano Melody (Smart), Organ Sonata, No. 2 (Mendelssohn); Minuet in A (Boccherini); Offertory in B flat (Welly); Holssworthy Church Bells (Wesley), and the "Cornelius March" (Mendelssohn); —An excellent Orchestral Concert was given by Mr. Julian Adams, at the Floral Hall, Devonshire Park, on Saturday evening, the 8th ult. The programme included Rossinis' Overture, Wilsam Tell; Mendelssohn's Symphony (No. 3, A minor) and a violin solo—Andante and Polonaise (Julien), well played by Mr. John Daly. Mr. Adams conducted, and also presided at the pianoforte.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—The fourth Concert of the Demerara Musical Society took place on July 28, at the Philharmonic Hall. Sir George Macfarren's Cantata, May Day, formed the first part, Mrs. H. L. Wight being very successful in her solos, and the choruses being creditably rendered. The remainder of the programme was miscellaneous, and consisted of orchestral selections, songs, partsongs, &c., the Concert concluding with an Operetta, Cuss and Saucers. Mr. Colbeck conducted, and Mr. Nusum was the accom-

GREAT MALVERN .- Two Concerts were given in the New Assembly Rooms, on the 21st ult., the object being to aid the Fund for the Restoration of the Old Parish Church of Badsey. Several ladies and Residuation of the One at all the Concerts, among whom were gentlemen (amateurs) took part in both Concerts, among whom were Miss G, spisted by the following artists, Miss Pattie Michle (contrallo), Miss Margaret Wild (plano), and Miss Amy Hickling (violin). The programme was varied by several rectitations given by Miss Isabel Bateman.

HENNE BAY.—On Monday, the 17th ult., Mr. E. A. Cruttenden gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church, assisted by Miss Alice Parry of the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Cruttenden's programme included works by Batiste, Guilmant, J. Baptiste Calkin, and Lemmens, the latter composer's grand Fantasia. "The Storm," being especially appreciated. Miss Parry sang "Rejoice greatly" (Messish), "From mighty Kings" (Judas), and "With verdure clad" (Creation), in excellent style.

from Thomas's Le Caid, were excellently rendered; and Mr. J. H. Ogden, of Rochdale, gave two songs, which were warmly received. Mr. David Clegg conducted.

LEEDS .- At the annual Service of Praise, at Salem Chapel, Hunslet LEEDS.—At the annual Service of Praise, at Salem Chapel, Hunsiet Lane, on Sunday, the 23rd ult, the choir, largely augmented, sang Dr. Bridge's Mossit Moriah and selections from Elijah and Hymn of Praise. The principals were Miss Annie Woods, Miss Ada Sutcliffe, Mr. A. F. Briggs, and Mr. J. Browning, the latter gentleman in place of Mr. D. Billington. Donations of flowers were afterwards sent to the hospitals. Mr. W. H. Hudson rendered efficient help at the organ, and Mr. W. Toothill conducted Newcastle-on-Type.—On Thursday, the 6th ult., at the Elswick Road Wesleyan Church, a musical flower service was given, the edifice being elaborately decorated with flowers and plants. The Rev. H. W. Jackson, B.A., presided. Haydin's Creation was rendered by the choir of the church, which was sugmented to 100 voices. The soloists were Miss Corrigal, Miss Foster, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. J. Nutton. Mr. Geo. Dodds conducted, and Mr. William Rea was organist.

Norwich.—A re-union of the late Dr. Buck's professional pupils was held at the Maid's Head Hotel, on Wednesday, the 5th ult., when the following gentlemen were present—viz., Mr. H. Stonex, Dr. Bunnett, Mr. A. R. Gaul, Mus. Bac., Mr. F. C. Atkinson, Mus. Bac., Mr. D., Middleton, Mr. G. M. Smith, Mr. F. Cambridge, Mr. F. A. Mann, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. G. Gaffe, F. C. O., Mr. A. J. Page, F. C. O., Mr. G. J. Campling, Mr. A. J. Smith, Mr. A. H. Livock, Mr. G. D. Harris, Mr. J. Loveless, and Mr. R. D. Bush. During the evening a number of glees and songs were sung. The thanks of the meeting and the Mr. Gampling, Who kindly lent the pianospite.

PARKGATE.-The seventeenth Anniversary of the Consecration PARKGATE.—The seventeenth Anniversary of the Consecration of Christ Church, and the opening of a new organ, were celebrated on the 1st ut. The instrument, built by Messrs. Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield, contains all the latest improvements, and is of remarkable sweetness and power. The authem, in the morning, was Himmel's "O come let us worship," the solo in which was admirably rendered. The sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York, PSpark, of Leeds, presided at the organ, both morning and evening, and fully displayed the beauties and capacities of the instrument.

PELSALF, WALSALL—The first Festival took place on Monday, the 20th ult., commencing with a Service at the Parish Church at 11 oclock, at which the Ven Archdeacon lies, M.A., preached. The service was intoned by the Vicar, Rev. J. L. Spencer, B.D. In the afternoon, a Flower Show was held, and, in the evening, Haydn's Creation was performed by a full band and chorus of 30 performers, the principal artists being Miss Fraser Brunner, Mr. W. Keay, and Mr. J. B. Snape. Mr. Rogers, A.Mus., of Walsall, conducted with his usual care. Mr. P. W. Key presided at the harmonium, and Mr. J. Somefield by the Secretaries, Measrs. Sluter and Moore, and a committee. There was a very large audicine. There was a very large audience.

ST. Bre's The Laws a very large addition.

ST. Bre's COMBRILAND.—Mr. Alfred H. Digby, M.T.C.L., Organist of the Collegiate and Priory Church, gave Organ Recitals on Bank Holiday, the 3rd ult. The programme consisted of selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, &c., and fully tested the capacities of the organ Hilli and Son), and the Organist. There was a large attendance from Whitehaven and district, and a good collection was made in aid of the church funds.

SHANKIN, I.W.—Mrs. Bishop gave a most successful Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on Monday, the 17th Lit, when she was assisted by Mrs. Glover Eaton, Mrs. Teetgen, Mr. Cotsford Dick, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, and Mr. Dudley Watkins (vocalists); Miss May and Mrs. Peacocke (pianoforte); Misses Roses and Ferry (violin); Mr. Stevenight (clarinet); Mr. Boucher (violoncello), and the Shanklin Town Band. There was a large audience.

There was a large audience.

Sydney.—The ninth Concert of the Metropolitian Liedertafel took place on June 3, in the New Masonic Hall. Several pieces already favourites with the audiences at these performances were repeated, and during the evening better to the market of the most successful market and the programme were Hatton's Part-song, "The Happiest Land," and the Yolksided Loreley. Songs were given by Mr. Walford, Mr. J. Callagan, Mr. Gordon, and Mr. Rodd; Mr. Hyndes (pianottet), Mr. Willmoff (volid), and Mr. McMahon (cornet) contributing solos with much effect. Mr. C. Huenerbein was, as usual, an able accompaniat. Being a Smoking Concert the room was found inconveniently small.

TESSAURAN, IRELAND.—The Annual Fête in connection with the parishes of Clonmacnois and Tessauran took place on Thursday, the 6th ult. The proceedings commenced with a short service in the church, Mr. David Beardwell presiding at the harmonium. In the evening a Concert was given, in which Mrs. Howes, Miss Mooney, Miss Addie Perry, Miss L'Estrange, and Miss Elverton took part with much success. Mr. Beardwell contributed a harmonium solo, and also a song, and readings were given by the Rev. W. W. Burbury and the Rev. A. E. Crotty.

WHEATHAMPSTEAD, HERTS.—A Special Service was held at the Parish Church, or Thursday afternoon, the 13th ult., on the occasion of the re-decisation of the restored ring of belts. Mendelssohn's Cantata, Lauda Sion, was sung as the anthem. The solos were given by Choristers Hoole and Green, Measra. W. Barchelor, G. Green, and C. Odell. The cantata was credently endedered, and the Service well satended. Mr. C. E. Jolley, F.C.O., presided at the organ.

Wimsorns.—A new organ, consisting of two manuals and thirteen stops, built by H. C. Sims, of Belle Yue Terrace, Southampton, at a cost of £200, has been erected in St. John's Church, and was formally opened by Mr. C. F. South, Organist of Salisbury Cathedral, on Tuesday, the 18th ult. In the morning the Service was Boyce in A, and the anthem "I will lift up mine eyes" (Clarke-Whiteld); the evening Service was Bunnett in F, and the anthem "Acquaint thyself with dod" (Greene). The choir was considerably calaged by members of the Minster Choir and Choral Association. Mr. A.

Wareham, alto of the Minster, was very successful in his rendering of the solo "Acquaint thyself-with God." After each Service Recitals were given by Mr. South from the works of Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Smart, and others. The Organist of the Church, Mr. Harry J. THE POEM WRITTEN BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Paper Cover, 2s. 6d.; Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth gilt, 4s.

Full Score and Orchestral Parts may be had on application to the Publishers.

THE TIMES.

"It would lead too far to follow the composer into all the details of his thoughtful and carefully developed work. Some of the most striking and successful prints should, however, be specified. Prominent among these as in prelude to the first scene of the Cantata, with the composition of the control of th

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Unquestionably, a good story is here, and well set out for musical treatment. In these respects the composer could hardly have been served better, and Mr. Cowen may consider himself fortunate. We note that the contract of the contract

STANDARD.

"This evening the first novelty of the Festival was presented in Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata 'Sleeping Beauty,' given with the most emphatic success under the bâton of the composer, who herein has followed up a notable list of successes with a work so fresh, ingenuous, and sparkling that it is likely to add the crowning laurel to his reputation. . 'Sleeping Beauty' contains all the elements of a permanent popularity, and it will assuredly go the rounds of the choral societies without loss of time. A more emphatic triumph has seldom, if ever, greeted the composition of a native musician. Mr. Cowen was not only vociferously cheered by the audience, choir, and orchestra, but was summoned back to the platform and a renewed outburst of applause. The Cantata is a valuable addition to the library of English music."

DAILY NEWS.

DAILY NEWS.

"The Cantata was enthusiastically received throughout, several of the numbers having been greatly applauded, especially the orchestral interlude suggestive of 'Maidenhood and Dreams of Love'; the opening chorus of the first scene; the Prince's scena 'Light, light at last,' and the final duet for the Prince and the Princess. The composer, who conducted the performance, was loudly cheered at its close. Mr. Cowen's Cantata is a work of exceptional merit, and will no doubt soon receive repetition in many quarters."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Every page of the score is instinct with grace and refinement, whilst in the vocal portions—choral or solo—there is not a bar that is ungrateful to the singer. Mr. Cowen's style is popular—better still, it is agreeable and thoroughly English—and he acts wisely in adhering to it. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Cowen has written nothing it. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Cowen has written nothing more melodic, nothing more elegant, and nothing more sustained in its musical interest than forest the saying the saying the which formed in the moft of the fascinating fairy tale which formed his more five Concert to-inght. There is a capitating this memory, even at a first hearing; and Mr. Cowen has neglected none of the opportunities for airy fancifulness in the orchestation growing out of the idea of the maiden, during her enforced sleep of many years, dreaming of the handsome young champion whose courage is to awaken her to life and to love. He possesses the priceless gift of melody—not the melody that comes by 'fits and starts' and then finds its outcome in short thems—but the broad-flowing tunefulness that seems to gather strength as it progresses."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"The subject is exactly suited to Mr. Cowen's talent, and he has handled it in his customary delicate and fanciful manner. The Cantata the bea boon to choral societies requiring a refined and pleasing but not too difficult work."

"Mr. Anderton has put forth all his strength to meet the varied demands of his subject as thus presented, and with a generally happy effect. His plan was to deal in independent fashion with each section of the book as it came, and hence the presentative themes. The music the presentative themes. The music presentative themes, the music advanced school; yet it is by no means formal and pedantic, presenting rather the happy union of modern expression with established form, to which it would be well if all English composers adhered. "The music is melodious and pleasing, and it was received with much applause throughout."

"Mr. Anderton has attempted nothing more than simple and unpretentious music, and he certainly has succeeded in imparting at the same time a spice of individuality to his setting. Among the points that should be mentioned are the pretty song in the earlier part of the work, 'I had a dream last night'; the tenor song, magnificently rendered by Mr. Joseph Maas, 'Away, away, over the foaming tide'; and the Gudrun episode, which had the advantage of Madame Trebelli's splendid voice."

"Mr. Prout has followed closely the lines laid down by the classical masters, having first turned a deaf ear to the counsels of their successors. The result is that we have a new symphony perfectly clean in form, so constructed as that the relation of any one part to the resilis readily discovered, and so scored as that the various provents use. These are great merits to begin with, and the various provents use. These are great merits to begin with, and the various provents use. These are great merits to begin with, and the various provents use. These are great merits to begin with, and the symphony is looked into. Following the oldest form, Mr. Prout begins with an independent introduction. From it he passes to an allegro, in which the cheerly offerened. The principal subject is worked out in which the cheerly discerned. The principal subject is worked out in quite joy cas mood, but always in scholarly fashion. Greater grace and provided the provided provided provided the provided provide

"Those who are acquainted with Mr. Prout's two former Symphonicals, and with his other thought and finished works, will be glad to learn that his this other thought and finished works, will be glad to learn that his this as either of its brethern. The third movement, "Intermezzo a l'Espagnole, 'is singularly engaging."

"Though in the matter of scoring his Symphony is essentially modern, yet in the flow of the music it is as straightforward as that of Haydn and Mozart. It is also full of brightness and vigour, and is certain to make a favourable impression at the first hearing, because the audience will follow it with ease."

HOLY CITY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"'The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work,"-Manchester

"This fine work will considerably enhance Mr. Gaul's reputation as a musician."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

RUTH

MUSIC BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

""Ruth" is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject. ... One of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, "Entreat me not to leave thee," which is instinct with pathetic expression. ... Boaz's solo, "Go not from hence, my daughter," is another conception; and the intermezzo, "Daybreat," and the juntility beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, "Daybreat," and the juntility beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, "Daybreat," and the juntility of with a joyous bound that great full of the standard completely away. An expenditure of the standard conception, and the intermezzo and chorus."—Brad"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. ... Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Briming ham cacepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Briming ham cacepted as a valuable addition to be likely better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The madens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh has well

Some years have passed since Mr. Joseph Bennett began, in The Musical Times, a series of biographical notices which are still far from ended: The original purpose was a limited one—namely, to through light upon the personality of famous musicians by means of extracts selected and arranged from their letters and other writings. Here series had for first title "The Great Composers, sketched by them-

Consequent upon the remarkable favour with which the notices were received, it was determined to extend their scope, and, while making prominent the Masters' own testimony, to deal with each subject in a complete biographical form, as far as allowed by the limits necessarily imposed. The words "aketched by themselves" were therefore dropped from the title.

It was further resolved to make the original idea, and to issue the notices are the composers dealt with under the original idea, and to issue the notices are the control of "Novello's Primers of Musical Biography" is to convey, as clearly as the limits of an elementary work will allow, a just idea of each composer's personality, and to record the principal events of his life. Knowledge of what a man is helps the understanding of what he does. These little books may serve, therefore, as a first step towards acquaintance with the genius and compositions of the masters to whom they are devoted.

GEORGE C. MARTIN. Price One Shilling each.

Church-music which is modern in form, interesting to a choir, and devotional in effect, whilst also of easy execution and of moderate compass for the voices, is certainly much needed in these days when choral societies are almost universal. This want is specially felt will regard to music for the Office of Holy Communion, and it is hope that these services will be found well within the capabilities of an ordinary choir, yet not wanting in an effort to give due expression the solemnity of the words.

An Arrangement of the whole Work for Pianoforte Solo, by Berthold Tours, in the Press.

"It may be briefly recapitulated that the work consists of four parts—a short prologue, a Requiem Mass, the 'Last Judgment,' and the Celestial Jerusalem.' In the prologue, which is sustained by the chorus and baritone solo, the keynote, or rather one of the keynotes of the conception, that of Death, is struck in a Lot three major seconds if the conception, that of Death, is struck in a Lot three major seconds if the conception, that of Death, is struck in a Lot three major seconds if the conception of a late of the conception of THE TIMES

STANDARD.

"In the Quartet 'Quid sum, miser,' the chief subject, allotted to the tenor, in G minor, is repeated by the contralto on the dominant, and again in its original position by the soprano; the bass solo then interrupts with the 'Rex tremende,' which, after a somewhat stern opening, merges into a charming and passionate melody for all four voices, redolent of the master's happiest manner from first to last. The 'Salve me' episode is both beautiful and poetical, the voice parts being admirably distributed, though a considerable tax is laid upon the powers of the soprano. Altogether, the 'Quid sum' akaes high rank amongst the good things which the author provides in 'Mors et Vita'. . . . The verse, 'Sed signifer Sanctus Michael,' sung by the sopran to a delicate accompaniment of wood-wind and violins, pulsating in triplets, while an occasional chord from the harp and the least suspicion of a touch on the cymbals gives colour and accentuation to the music. This is another of M. Gounod's little triumphs . . . The truly lovely theme which is entitled 'The Motive of Happiness,' whose 'linked sweetness' extends to fifteen bars. No termpt is made to develop this, but in its concentrated form it is so fascinating that probably any alteration would be a disfigurement, with the addition of goog one and a grand of gain, lord of the chestra, with the addition of goog one and a grand of gain, estimated the will be a significant, peroration is attained, and the chief division of the rillogy ends forcibly, as it began . . . The exquisite and prolonged themewhich first prefaces and afterwards accompanies the chorus, 'Sedenti in Throno,' is unquestionably the most inspired of the trilogy."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The new Oratorio is technically and asshetically a success, though, perhaps, more so in the latter sense than in the former. It cannot be heard without emotion; or without a sense, at the end, that the spirit of the hearer has been raised to higher than earthly things, while his artistic imagination has been excited and his bodily sense gratified. These results I take as assured signs that the composer's mark has been fully hit. ... 'Mors et Vita' impresses—I was about to write awes. The outcome of deep feeling, its music surrounds the hearer with a religious atmosphere, from the influence of which there is no escape. In other words, this Oratorio fulfils the highest function of a work of art, which is to place the observer on the same level, and en rapport with itself."

"In this, as in M. Gounod's earlier Oratorio, are apparent a deep and earnest religious feeling: 1 a power of expressing both the awful and the beautiful aspects of Divine wrath, its justice and mercy, and an individuality of style and treatment which impress both works as being unmistakably the productions of the master from whom alone they could have proceeded. As in 'The Redemption', so in 'Mors et Vita', orchestral colouring is a pervading and important feature throughout; the recurrence of the representative themes already specified giving a unity to the latter work. Special effects are produced by the six trumpets, six horns, and other orchestral combinations. The instrumentation in 'Mors et Vita' is in many cases similar to that of 'The Redemption,' and other works of the composer. This, however, does not imply mannerism, but merely such distinctive individuality of style as is to be found in all masters and authors who have risen above the common herd of mere imitators. This M. Gounod assuredly has done, not only in operas, but notably in his two great Oratorios, of which 'Mors et Vita' is the later and grander example. We believe it is to be given in London by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on Wednesday evening, November 1, and Tuesday evening, Docember 1."

DALLY CHRONICLE. DAILY NEWS.

Alley CHRONICLE.

""Mors et Vita' is worthy of M. Gounod at his very best. . . . In any estimate of Gounod's finer works henceforward made, 'Mors et Vita' has be mentioned in the same breath with 'The Redemption,' the same breath experience of the same breath with 'The Redemption,' the bigher credentials of the same Mirelle. The individual asking for bigher credentials of the same Mirelle. The individual asking for bigher credentials of the same Mirelle. The individual asking for bigher credentials of the same bigher credentials of the same barries. The individual asking for bigher credentials of the same bigher credentials, of the same properties of the work I have no doubt—indeed, it is quite likely to be, a couple of years hence, a greater favourite than 'The Redemption'. . . Every quality that is most admired in Gounod's music is to be found in 'Morset' Vita.' It abounds in rich harmonies, and in those sweeping currents of full melody that take the imagination captive."

"Meanwhile it will suffice to record the deep impression made by this morning's performance. The beautiful concerted pieces and choruses of the requiem, enriched by instrumentation of the most attractive kind, derived full beneft from a well-nigh faultless interpretation, and were listened to with a rapt attention that told its tale as clearly as the loudest applause would have done; indeed it was more than once palpably difficult for the audience to restrain from indulging in outward tokens of their delight."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"In respect of melody the new work is far richer than 'The Redemption.' There is very little recitative, and a positive wealth of delicious tune. As abstract music it is therefore more attractive than the earlier Oratorio, popular as that has become."

ACTION-

Inventors of the Double Valve Action, both valves opening with only one pitman; originators of the manner of opening Back Valve by means of Lever. By this invention our larger Organs have the advantage over any other makers, using Exhaust Bellows, as by the free and proper distribution of the Vibrators we are enabled to produce quick speech from the largest to the smallest reed, with either light or strong blowing of Bellows. Our Mr. G. Piggott originated this action in the year 1873, and the same has been perfected and used by us for the last ten years.

TUBES-

Only by the above system of action can the Scribner Tubes be used with full effect, as the register in connection with the Tubes opens into the back valve, thereby adding greatly to the power and brilliancy of the Tube Register or set of Reeds. The invention known as Scribner Tubes we have used for the last ten years, neither time nor expense having been spared in improving and perfecting the same, and only in our various Combination Styles can the best effect of this invention be found.

TWO-MANUAL ORGANS-

Our various styles of Two-Manual and Pedal Organs are simple in construction, and the coupler movements are not liable to get out of order. We particularly call attention to the arrangement of the Vibrators or Reeds, also to the Pedal and Manual Coupler arrangements, of which we are the original inventors.

BELLOWS-

Style 93.

Our system of Bellows will withstand all climatic changes, as by our method of construction all risks of cracking and splitting are avoided, all the wooden parts being pinned and pannelled, leaving an opening of about one-eighth of an inch between panel and frame work, which is covered with strong rubber drill.

CHALLEN & SON'S Iron-Frame Pianos

LONDON. 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS. 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

TESTIMONIALS.

ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882. Having used one of your Pianos a great de' for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly,

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-elass workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O., English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs. Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Son. In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability under hard wear.

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if not unequalled.
